

I: "The French."

They: "Cinco de Mayo."

It's foreign flags. It's skulls. It's Zapatistas. It's Santa Muerte. It's a dark cult spirit. It's Chicano racism against and rejection of White Americans. It's foreign leverage over Americans. It's violent pulp art. It's psychological wars. It's knife or machete violence. It's targeting blondes and American people. It's cartels & gangs. It's hoisting foreign flags. It's rapid demographic shifts as a military tactic. It's celebrating their military over ours. It's bullying. It's aggression. It's violence.

If you are in the USA, you ought to be supporting the U.S. military and our veterans, not committing treason to support paramilitary cartels and gangs. Is there a culture war so divided that this understanding has gone astray?

Are newcomers supporting militarization against Americans, specifically, White French Americans simply because of where their old military loyalties used to lie?

Obviously, it's a different time; some move on, some get left behind.

I have always supported multiculturalism in the USA; however, the "new generation" of multiculturalism has taken a darker turn.

Today, they celebrate my hurt.

I remember when New England was first introduced to avocados and salsa. It was not that long ago. What I did not realize was how quickly an entirely new cultural landscape could be layered over my own, framed as inclusion, experienced as erasure, just to make foreign nations more comfortable.

They never saw me, and they never will. It's clearly not about us.

What's most unsettling is that we now accept the celebration of a modern cultural Cold War as the new "normal." In doing so, the blame has been misplaced, redirected, simplified, and misunderstood. Racism and vitriol against Americans by newcomers has become "normalized."

For these reasons, I'm choosing to support American companies and those who align with American values.

American culture must come first in this country.

This used to be a given. What happened during the pandemic?

→ The "humble" beginnings of WW3.

Thank you to those who are of different cultures and are still naturally assimilating and still culturally "normal," "healthy," and able to integrate with the American people with social humanity, common kindness and manners.

To those who are here and clearly aim to harm Americans, we see you, and we challenge this experience by asking you to leave our country and return to yours, with all due respect.
