

“Is That A Gun?”

From the comment section... American Sanity.

The energetic field and social climate in America has shifted in disturbing ways.

Historical slavery and modern slavery are not identical, yet society is entering a new era of psychological, economic, and social control. Increasing polarization, racial hostility, manipulation, trafficking concerns, and political corruption have caused many Americans to lose trust in institutions and in one another.

People do not want to live in fear, nor do they want to feel targeted, excluded, or devalued because of their background, beliefs, or identity. Communities deteriorate when individuals or organizations promote division, resentment, or hidden agendas instead of empathy, accountability, and mutual respect.

Many Americans are deeply concerned about corruption, exploitation, and extremism across political and social systems. Questions about human trafficking, abuse of power, media influence, and political integrity have contributed to widespread distrust and instability.

The result is a growing sense of social destabilization. When fear and resentment dominate public life, extremism becomes normalized, and ordinary citizens become the ones most affected. Americans are victimized.

A stable society requires transparency, accountability, compassion, and equal human dignity under the law, without hatred, racial targeting, or ideological warfare, this includes modern forms of “social justice activism.”
