

Politics Isn't The Conversation, Safety Is

Whether you voted left or right, let's put it in the past, the conversation has changed. We are Americans, neighbors, families, veterans, workers, students, parents, friends, and members of our communities. There are moments when safety becomes the conversation, and this is one of those moments.

Pay attention to the people around you. Check on your family, your neighbors, veterans, elderly people, and anyone who may need help. Learn first aid. Know your surroundings. Prepare your home. Keep emergency supplies available. Know who you can call and where you can go when something happens.

There is meaningful work everywhere. Help somebody move. Bring somebody food. Clean up a neighborhood. Volunteer. Learn emergency preparedness. Help an animal. Teach someone something useful. Check on the person who lives alone. These small actions can make all of the difference.

We have spent a great deal of time talking about politics. Now we need people willing to participate in the safety and care of their communities. Every person has something they can contribute.

Take care of each other. Stay aware. Stay prepared. Keep moving forward together.

We have work to do.

Armor Up.
