Wind Turbines, Thousands Upon Thousands, Hours Upon Hours

Scary red lights that go on for hours. I did not know what they were, but I could feel “static in the air.” The clouds were dark overhead. I drove hours longer just to get away from the red blinking lights. I thought they were wind farms but was unsure. I was able to see them the next day.

Thousands upon thousands that go on for hours, massive wind turbines altering the landscape. Though these places are more rural, they feed the grid of distant cities. Several of the companies are foreign, for example, Canada based. I can only imagine the work and labor that went into installing these. Thank your local construction worker!

For New England rural communities, it is a resounding no. We would be supporting cities like Boston or New York and significantly altering the land as well as the natural surroundings with unnatural red blinking lights. The feeling is “urban” in rural landscapes and also not the peaceful nature we would be used to.

These wind farms are “scattered,” and many are required. For example, one city may require thousands upon thousands. They are not small; they are very large. They go on for hours upon hours! Images do not do them justice.

For places like rural New Mexico and rural Texas, where there are not a lot of people around and there is more desert, it may not be as big of an adjustment. However, they definitely alter the landscape.

Word to the wise, vote no on wind farms in rural New England communities. We would lose our nature, peace, and quiet!
