These men are actively attacking him. They are not from the USA. Some have already been deported. Imagine how much better the streets would be if we never had to worry about people from foreign cultures not respecting our laws? Or never returning after deportation? This experience is not fair to Americans and is costing us, everything.

One woman says an important message to viewers. Don't do drugs. Even from doctors. "Tell the doctors to go to hell."

Veteran Community

I agree. I have become worried about civilian medical treatment of the veteran community. I have noticed that they are actively working to treat veterans with drugs, mushrooms, MDMA, etc. I fear that the American experience is becoming "too left," and politically focused.

Experience

I received a false diagnosis from the VA and had to schedule another appointment in order to correct my records. There were multiple entries in my records that were false. These diagnoses were "alcohol disorder," "opiate disorder," and "cigarette smoker." None of these are true. I drink very rarely (I have had less than two drinks in the last year – A few sips of a beer at a movie for "nostalgia," a "Stella," and a beverage at lunch last summer), not because of any disorder or addiction, but simply because I do not feel a thirst for alcohol. I also do not smoke, have never smoked cigarettes, and never take opiates.

So, when I saw these things in my records, it caused me to feel uncomfortable and nervous. So much had happened, and I was worried about activists and veteran records. This is a real worry that I have. I returned and made sure that my records were updated. They provided me with a hardship payment for this experience, which was helpful and set my mind at ease.

I am very grateful for my experience with the VA and know that there are many great people working there who only want to help veterans. This experience does not change my gratitude or my overall experience. It is simply the worries that I have about certain politics or activism, and I am now always very, very protective of my experience anywhere. I think that it is important to remain self-aware and safe regarding all interactions.

It would seem that even when I interact less with people, I still experience boundary violations, issues, or strange experiences. I have realized that we really have to be strong in our self-advocacy. This was the greatest lesson for me.
