They call them the Army because they do more pushups than the other branches.

Summary

While many Americans are discouraged by President Trump's policies, crime statistics show improvements in several areas. Currently, we are particularly concerned about politically motivated violence and domestic terrorism, including threats associated with left-wing extremism. We are also concerned about potential bias in data collection and reporting, as we believe some reports may be politically motivated or fail to capture the full scope of the issues being reported.

Many White Americans are still learning how to advocate for themselves, report discrimination, and seek appropriate remedies. Some may be deterred from doing so by social stigma, concerns about anti-White bias, or fear of retaliation and further mistreatment. We believe that fair and comprehensive reporting should account for the experiences of all Americans, apply consistent standards across demographic and political groups, and ensure that allegations of discrimination, political violence, and abuse are evaluated objectively and supported by evidence.

Data breaches are also a real concern:

Defining the Russian Threat Against Europe

"The Kremlin has been increasing kinetic activity against Europe since last summer, including near-daily incursions into NATO airspace, cutting undersea cables, and arson attacks. In this video, ISW Director of the Defense of Europe Project Mason Clark argues that the terms 'hybrid attacks' and 'provocations' should not be used to define Russia's military campaign and that NATO and Europe face three challenges to be considered in the face of Russian escalation."
