

Lindsay Clancy Case, Activists:

They are really hopping on the bandwagon of a much larger movement and issue: the argument that murder should be excused as mental illness. The success of these campaigns has implications; it means that mass-murder campaigns as asymmetrical warfare may be excused at the individual level.

Where left-wing groups are actively supporting criminals and migrants and advocating for the abolishment of defense systems, it arguably operates logistically as a form of hybrid warfare, which may lead to active conflict.

These campaigns are not just women in pink justifying murder; they are led by a deeper network of activists who aim to cause harm to U.S. citizens through modern warfare. This is called fourth-generation warfare. They are simply an arm of a much bigger, more powerful, and complex war. They are a component.

Activists are estranged from normal society. It shocks the conscience that they would mobilize to support a female murderer, but when understanding the issues from a modern-war perspective, it becomes easier to understand.

The question isn't just about this campaign, but what else is involved, what the strategy is, what the real message is being sent, and who else—with a high likelihood of “-ovsky”—they are affiliated with.
