

Between Hispanic propaganda campaigns, anti-White hate, claims that the United States is Mexico, and cartel atrocities, we wonder whether a peaceful future is possible.

Despite American voice suppression through Hispanic-focused propaganda, the reality is that many Americans are unhappy with the demographic and cultural changes taking place in their communities. Demographic shifts generate severe concern and debate in many countries, and people in Hispanic-majority countries would also express concerns about significant demographic or cultural changes within their own societies. So, what gives with the lack of empathy toward the American people?

The United States is not Mexico, nor is it the Spanish Empire. Americans have experienced real harms associated with transnational crime, cartel violence, and trafficking. At the same time, Americans have had to endure the responsibility for these issues while also being vilified for protecting their nation. Social justice issues are too often attributed primarily to White people, despite the complex historical, political, and geographic factors, and despite the realities.

We realize we are catching up with the times. Americans are combating the very real foreign succession of crime; this experience accompanies population growth and psychological warfare. The most successful entities in the criminal arena today stem from the new Hispanic nation. This is the Hispanic nation that many Americans feel has betrayed the USA, by not only staking claim here and actively harming the American people, but by rewriting history, committing mass atrocities and then shifting blame.

This is our reality.

Source: <https://mexicodailypost.com/2025/04/26/with-fewer-migrants-to-exploit-mexican-cartels-are-reportedly-targeting-civilians-including-americans/#:~:text=With%20border%20crossings%20down%2C%20Mexican%20cartels%20have%20re%20sorted,in%20Mexico%2C%20particularly%20in%20border%20towns%20like%20Ju%C3%A1rez.>