

Union of Saints, The Silencing of White Americans

The silencing of white Americans poses a grave risk to our nation. It is not only a loss of voice, but a diminishment of spirit and identity. In generations past, we opened the stage to minority populations in the pursuit of fairness and equality. Yet today, white Americans themselves are becoming a minority in the wider world. And too often, movements that claim liberation have been wielded as instruments of suppression. This is no abstract fear — it is something we have witnessed firsthand.

Many among us supported leaders such as President Obama, President Biden, and Vice President Harris, with a sincere hope for justice and balance in leadership. Yet truth must be spoken plainly: a people cannot be asked to step aside and surrender their place within their own homeland. To displace Americans in favor of foreign newcomers is not progress; it is a wound to the body of the nation, and at times, it rises to the level of terrorism.

It has never been acceptable for Americans to harm Americans. Yet today, some are joined by foreign actors in acts of violent extremism — killing innocents, parading such brutality as though it were just or normal. Nothing could be farther from the truth. A house divided cannot stand. But united, we must stand as true Americans: people of heart and soul, who meet their neighbors with tolerance and respect, even when opinions differ.

Though politics may grow heated, violence can never be the answer. The first duty of our government is the safety of its citizens, and we support every lawful measure that secures peace in America. No government is perfect, for it is built of people, yet each day we can strive to grow wiser, stronger, and more faithful in the work of protecting our own — especially the vulnerable who face the greatest risks in this unsettled time.

Activists who fuel division and unrest would do well to step back from agitation and pursue the quieter, steadier path of research and reflection. In our own work, through the study of more than 4,000 articles and careful analysis, we have come to see that the American voice is indeed being suppressed. Just as travelers honor the customs of the lands they visit, so too must newcomers honor America — her culture, her land, her beliefs, and above all her people. And those who stand with immigrants must recognize this truth as well.

For America is a generous nation: giving, providing, and deeply loving. Yet, like any home, she requires boundaries. And when those boundaries are not respected, we must — with all the love in our hearts — put first our families, our friends, and our communities. Violence against Americans cannot be tolerated, nor can the glorifying of such violence. No means no. Americans must come first in their own country, or else we risk losing all that we have built and all that we have fought for.

That is the bottom line: we must protect our home.

Friends, fellow Americans,

The silencing of white Americans is not a small matter.
It is a grave risk to our nation.
It is not only the loss of a voice,
but the dimming of spirit,
the erasure of identity.

In generations past, we opened the stage to minority populations,
seeking fairness,
seeking equality.
Yet today, white Americans themselves are becoming a minority in the wider world.
And too often, movements that claim liberation
have been turned into instruments of suppression.
This is no theory, no speculation —
this is something we have witnessed with our own eyes.

Many of us once placed our hopes in leaders such as President Obama,
President Biden,
and Vice President Harris.
We did so in good faith, believing in justice, believing in balance.
But the truth must be spoken plainly:
no people can be asked to step aside
and surrender their place in their own homeland.
To displace Americans in favor of foreign newcomers is not progress —
it is a wound upon the body of the nation.
And at times, it rises to the level of terrorism.

It has never been acceptable for Americans to harm Americans.
And yet today,
some are joined by foreign actors in violent extremism —
killing innocents,
parading brutality as though it were normal,
as though it were just.
But nothing could be farther from the truth.

A house divided cannot stand.
But united, we must stand —
as true Americans:
people of heart,
people of soul,
people who treat their neighbors with tolerance and respect,
even when opinions differ.

Yes, politics may grow heated.
But violence is never the answer.

The first duty of government is the safety of its citizens.
And we support every lawful measure to ensure peace in America.
No government is perfect — it is made of people.
But people can grow.
We can strive, every day,
to be wiser, stronger,
more faithful in the work of protecting our own —
especially the vulnerable among us,
who now stand at greatest risk.

And so I say:
let activists who fuel division step back from agitation.
Let them take the quieter, steadier path —
of study,
of reflection,
of understanding.
For we, in our own work,
through thousands of articles studied,
through years of reflection and analysis,
have come to see this clearly:
the American voice is being suppressed.

Just as travelers honor the customs of the lands they visit,
so too must newcomers honor America —
her culture,
her land,
her beliefs,
and above all, her people.
And those who speak for immigrants must recognize this truth as well.

For America is generous.
She is giving.
She is providing.
She is deeply loving.
But like any home, she requires boundaries.
And when those boundaries are crossed,
we must — with love in our hearts —
put first our families,
our friends,
and our communities.

Violence against Americans cannot be tolerated.
Nor can the glorifying of such violence.
No means no.
And Americans must come first in their own country,

or else we risk losing all that we have built,
all that we have fought for.

And so I leave you with this truth, this bottom line:

We must protect our home.
