Understanding the potential modern implications of World War II and how they may affect citizens today is very important in order to protect all people and remember our shared humanity. History shows that war can affect civilian populations through propaganda, dehumanization, fear, surveillance, coercion, social division, economic pressure, and industrial systems that impact public health and safety. The lessons of the Holocaust continue to remind the world of the importance of protecting human dignity, autonomy, safety, and ethical responsibility within governments, industries, and communities.

With consideration for the times we are living in, I remain concerned about war in all forms, including psychological, social, environmental, industrial, and chemical harms that may negatively affect civilian well being. This includes concerns surrounding the historical legacy and modern regulation of industrial pesticides and chemical technologies where public health, environmental safety, and human rights may be impacted. I am also concerned about modern forms of exploitation and abuse, including trafficking, forced filming, public humiliation, coercion, intimidation, organized harassment, and shame campaigns that may compromise a person's dignity, autonomy, safety, and emotional well being.

Lastly, I am concerned about mass instrumental migrations, political violence, anti American activism, hostility toward public servants, anti border security policies, and other forms of social instability that may negatively affect civilian safety and national stability. Remembering history is important because it helps guide society and encourages people to remain informed, vigilant, and grounded in our shared humanity. Union of Saints remains firm in its commitment to American safety. Our concerns and observations align with evidence based research, public safety, and the protection of human rights for all people.
