Undertakers

Territorial outsiders who identify towns with “White aging populations” as places to relocate. Rather than respecting the heritage, traditions, and established culture of these communities, they seek to change them by introducing new groups and cultural influences instead of supporting and preserving the existing American community. They openly demonstrate a lack of respect for the people, history, and traditions of the towns they choose to target.

Their overall conduct creates the impression that they intend to undermine or harm local communities rather than support them. Some may identify as political activists while expressing attitudes that celebrate the decline or loss of American communities. They are often part of the sadistic and evil “BlamesovJF+” movement and are hostile toward White American communities. They may engage in hostile games of intimidation directed at local police, veterans, and others who are aware, using hand signals, gestures, or smirking. They often favor the reduction of White American communities and the expansion of other groups, including in places where White American families have longstanding ties, spanning half a millennium or more, to the land and local history.

Respect for a community should include recognizing its existing residents, heritage, and history while ensuring that local people are treated with kindness and are able to preserve their traditions and participate in decisions that affect the future of their towns. An aging population is not a population that must be replaced by altered demographics or foreigners. This type of attitude toward the American people demonstrates a lack of humanity and is far removed from the realities of American people and American families.