

With Sword and Shield

D. Cowdrey

It is beyond any reasonable stretch of the imagination that hostile actors would come to this country, draw from the American Dream, and then cause harm to the people and the nation that offered opportunity. What followed were actions of war, revenge, coercion, enslavement, femicide and suicide. These events shaped a landscape of suffering so severe it resists ordinary moral language: hell.

Good souled immigrants remain an essential part of this country. Many arrive in good faith, honor the American Dream, contribute meaningfully to their communities, and bring creativity, labor, and vitality to the nation. Their presence strengthens the social fabric and reflects the best ideals of shared civic life.

Yet many of these harms by negative characters remain irreversible, they were premeditated harms, and sworn through. These realities require redress, lawful response, and swift action. Protection of people, preservation of culture, and moral boundaries are necessary for social stability and trust.

Language and conduct within activist spaces also carry consequence. When activism rhetoric becomes hostile and speech loses its grounding in humanity, the result is violence. Words shape behavior. Harmful language has repeatedly translated into real world murders and prolonged suffering.

Many people were already wounded. Additional cruelty deepened those wounds. As if life and loss is not hard enough, grief was met with disregard. This pattern reflects moral erosion and decay. A society endures through truth, responsibility, and care for those who have suffered loss. Compassion is not an option, it is the construct of humanity itself.

We march forward with discernment and we heal from our honesty. If we are to achieve peace, we must do so through accountability, and we must honor Americans, who have been so kind to share their country and culture. Most of all, we must not ignore, because times have shown us the spiraling cost of no boundaries or borders, if ever a time to draw swords and shield, that time is now. Save America, with sword, shield and spirit, march forward.
