

Surgical and Chemical Mutilation, Josef Mengele

Another deeply disturbing trend involves the sterilization of children through surgical and chemical interventions.

Josef Mengele

He held doctorates in anthropology and medicine and began his career as a researcher. He later became a German military officer and physician during World War II. He was responsible for forcing sex-change experiments on victims of the Holocaust; this included children.

“Mengele was described as capable of appearing kind to children. He would allow them to become fond of him, bring them sugar, and pay attention to small details in their daily lives—behaviors that, in isolation, might seem compassionate or admirable. Yet alongside this apparent kindness existed the reality of the crematoria smoke and the knowledge that these same children could be sent to their deaths the next day, or even within the hour. That contradiction is where the true anomaly lay.”

Union of Saints feels that consent begins at adulthood, but even then, that may be too soon for a life-altering change. Twenty-five percent of surgeries may result in complications.

“Regret” statistics seem to have changed in recent years, since 2019. Again, the trend shows that many articles are written by foreign physicians and authors.

I feel that American readers should be very wary of claims by foreign authors, but also of strong assertions such as “less than 0.1% regret their changes.” This data is not only inaccurate, but it is also not conclusive. No data system exists today that is truly able to measure the number of people who regret their surgery.

These types of studies and policies are incredibly premature, though they position themselves as if they know it all, as if they have written the books on the theories of the universe itself. The truth is, most of these authors are still relatively young, and our world is just beginning to understand these types of surgeries. It was not that long ago that people were convinced that lobotomies were acceptable as well.

Our main point: Please leave children alone and out of this political debate. No surgeries or chemical mutilations on children, ever.
