

American Political Independence and Strategic Separation

Union of Saints

Israel benefactors, activists, and politicians have had increasing influence within American politics and American institutions. We are concerned that foreign influence has affected our political sphere, suppressed forms of American speech, taken away certain freedoms, and allowed underground operations and foreign interests to operate within the United States. The United States has the right to seek greater separation from foreign influence when this influence creates security consequences or harms American citizens.

Our government should put American citizens, American constitutional freedoms, American communities, and American national interests first. We seek the strategic removal of foreign influence that has entered American political, social, religious, and institutional spheres and caused serious and potentially irreparable harms to the values and freedoms we uphold. American political office exists to serve the American people, not foreign governments or foreign political interests. Americans have the right to preserve their political independence and determine the laws, policies, and affairs of the United States without undue foreign influence.

This should apply equally to foreign governments, foreign political organizations, activists, benefactors, and foreign agents, regardless of the country they represent. Our concern is with documented foreign influence and conduct within the United States. Where religion or ethnicity is relevant, it should be examined only in connection with documented conduct against American citizens or American institutions, rather than applied collectively to an entire religious or ethnic population.

The United States should investigate foreign operations occurring within our country, require full accountability, protect Americans from foreign interference, and establish clearer boundaries between foreign interests and American political decision-making.

America should be free to determine its own local and foreign policy, protect its own citizens, and preserve the constitutional freedoms and value systems of the American people without undue influence from any foreign government or foreign principal. Countries of Harmful Foreign Influence and Security Concern: Israel, Palestine, China, Russia, Iran, Mexico, India, Venezuela, Jewish Bund, Islamic Society, or any other foreign power. Americans seek greater political independence and strategic separation from foreign influence that threatens American security, freedoms, values or the interests of the American people.

The principle is simple: American political decisions should be made by Americans, for America, and always remain free from undue foreign influence. Foreign interests should never take precedence over the interests of the American people. America is not a proxy for anyone else's interests, and our sovereignty is not up for negotiation.

America must remain America the free.
