

Union of Saints Communion Letter

A Call to Healing, Unity, and Peace

Dear Friends,

We gather at this communion table not just as individuals, but as a family—a family bound by history, sacrifice, and the spirit of America.

The Modern Cold War has left scars: distrust, division, and invisible wounds that have stretched across communities. We step forward as a people committed to healing. We choose not to be defined by fear or hostility, but by courage, compassion, and the timeless belief that we are stronger when we stand together.

We honor those who have carried the weight of sacrifice: our veterans, who bore the uniform of freedom; our active-duty military, who continue to safeguard peace; our police officers, who serve with courage in our neighborhoods; and our firefighters, who run toward danger when others flee. Their lives of service remind us that self-sacrifice is not an abstract idea, but a living, breathing example of love in action.

Communion is more than a ritual—it is a symbol of togetherness. It reminds us that no one heals alone, no one carries the burden of life by themselves. Around this table, the American family—regardless of race, faith, or background—comes together to share in something bigger than ourselves.

This is the heart of American values:

- Gratitude to those in service.
- The pledge to protect and preserve our country.
- Faith and God as a source of peace, not division.
- Hope that rises even in the face of challenge.

At the Union of Saints, we believe in building a healing community—one where veterans find rest, where first responders feel appreciated, where families discover belonging, and where all people are lifted by love, truth, and peace.

As we lift our cup today, let us remember: this land is our shared table. This moment is our shared communion. And this life—this precious American life—is our shared gift.

Let us move forward together. Let us celebrate faith and peace. And let us be a light not only for one another, but for the broader community and the world.

With love, bravery and strength,

Union of Saints
