

All Saints' Day & A New Day of Remembrance

On All Saints' Day, we honor those of valor, our union of saints who rose above societal norms, who reached higher, who triumphed over evil and brought compassionate enlightenment to the world. We remember the saints who fought battles of the heart, who faced shadows and stood in the light of God. Yet in addition to this holy remembrance, our union of saints declares a new day:

Women's Modern Holocaust and Slavery Remembrance & Reconciliation Day.

Society has long observed Remembrance Day to honor those who fell on the battlefields of war. This is right and sacred. Yet the world has not set aside a day to honor another battlefield—the hidden and silenced wars waged against women and children through slavery, exploitation, femicide, and abuse. This form of slavery—often sexual in nature—strikes at the very soul, leaving deep scars across generations.

On this day, we bring these hidden sufferings into the light. We shine truth where there has been silence. We uplift victims, and we call perpetrators into account. We do not hide in the shadows of war or evil, but rather stand firm in the shadow of God and the divine, under the protection of the spiritual rune that pierces heaven, hell, past, present, and future.

This day is a call to duty, a sword line drawn in the sand. To those who enslave, we declare: a saint is not to be toyed with by demons. To those who have suffered, we promise healing, remembrance, and light. To all, we offer reconciliation—healing for the wounded, and trembling for those who refuse the path of truth.

This day, like All Saints' Day, reminds us that the battle between good and evil is not abstract—it lives in the hearts, choices, and societies of today. We honor the men and women who have suffered. We especially uplift the women and children, whose wounds have too often been ignored. We do this not with silence, but with remembrance, reconciliation, and a kiss of blessing that overturns the curses of the past.
