Summary and Context

Based on April 2026 reports, there is no conventional, unified war by Latin America against the United States. Instead, there are rising diplomatic tensions and warnings of regional "rebellion," driven by U.S. policy actions and military involvement.

Colombian President Gustavo Petro has warned that continued pressure from Washington could provoke regional resistance. (Investing.com)

Key Regional Tensions (April 2026)

- Regional Rebellion Warning:
President Petro warned of a potential "rebellion" against U.S. influence, citing political pressure and sanctions on Latin American leaders. (Investing.com)
- Military Action in Venezuela / Caribbean:
The United States has intensified regional operations, including actions tied to efforts to capture Venezuelan leader Nicolás Maduro, which Petro says has heightened fear among regional governments. (Investing.com)
- Pro-U.S. vs. Anti-U.S. Divide:
Latin America remains divided, with some governments opposing U.S. actions and others aligning more closely with Washington.
- Drug War Framing:
The U.S. has characterized parts of its regional strategy as an "armed conflict" against drug cartels, contributing to escalating enforcement actions.
- Diplomatic Backlash:
Countries including Mexico, Brazil, and Chile have raised concerns about sovereignty, legality, and regional stability in response to renewed U.S. intervention.

Overall Assessment

The current climate is increasingly described as a "new era of gunboat diplomacy," reflecting heightened geopolitical friction rather than a formal, unified war.
