

Nel's Response to Political Retaliation

In today's political climate, cycles of retaliation shape how we see each other. One side responds to perceived injustices against Caucasians and Americans by foreigners; the other counters these actions, often escalating tensions. Extremism exists on both sides, but the human cost—fear, division, and even violence—is real and immediate. Our society's challenges—from the pandemic's upheavals to cultural shifts in lifestyle and values—reflect deeper divides that go beyond politics.

Racial and social polarization is often magnified, sometimes for political gain. While DEI initiatives have rightfully sought to uplift marginalized communities, they can be misapplied, creating new forms of imbalance or exclusion. National responsibility matters: a nation burdened by debt must prioritize its own citizens, while voluntary acts of charity and global aid remain noble—but they cannot be forced. True freedom comes from choice, not coercion.

Amid misinformation and propaganda, the truth is our guide. Careful analysis, research, and honest reflection allow us to see shared humanity where division seems to reign. Healing begins when we recognize our responsibility to each other: to support generational Americans, honor those who share this land, and rise above cycles of retaliation. In truth and compassion, we find the strength to rebuild, to reconcile, and to lead with integrity.
