

Racial, Religious “Succession” That Harms

Cowdrey

Religious, Racial Political Succession:

Choosing a political leader to support, staying loyal to that person while gaining influence alongside them, and eventually positioning yourself to succeed them:

- Shtadlan (שטדלן) — historically, a Jewish intermediary or advocate who worked with political authorities on behalf of the Jewish community. This involved cultivating relationships and influence.
- Yerushah (ירושה) — inheritance or succession. This can describe receiving a position or authority after someone else.
- Machloket (מחלוקת) — disagreement or dispute, particularly a principled dispute.
- Machiavellianism — outside Judaism, supporting or aligning with someone while pursuing one's own eventual power. It isn't specifically Jewish.
- Political patronage / succession strategy — modern political terminology would probably describe it as cultivating a relationship with a powerful figure while positioning oneself as their successor.

The stories of David and Saul, or Absalom and David, involve questions of loyalty, succession, ambition, and legitimate authority. They are not presented as a general Jewish political doctrine. They do, however, provide historical and religious examples in which loyalty, succession, ambition, and authority are significant themes.

The truth is, without being shamed, harassed, threatened, and manipulated by the word “anti-Semitism,” as if the word itself offers infinite protections even against some of the most heinous crimes, there is a question worth examining. In this consideration, the word they may be using is “Satan” rather than “Semitic.” Are you “anti-Satan?” No one is immune from the great thief and manipulator, and in fact, when one human is protected more than another, perhaps there should be all that much more concern.

I think many Americans have awakened to the religion that is the Jewish faith. For many of us, we lived in our own communities without ever being exposed. Many of us are still learning, and the truth is that we are appalled by some of our learnings and do not feel that the faith is compatible with our values. I could list the issues, but they are so dark, grim and perverse that it isn't fair to the human spirit.

Sadly, worse, Americans are also being attacked, and we have been for quite some time, by newcomers and those of other faiths. Particularly, White Americans have been attacked, unknowingly, because White Americans saw others just the same as they saw themselves. Race conflict was hardly experienced in the earlier years of my life, and we shared in community and were happy; that was it.

We uplifted everyone's spirit through community, sport, gatherings, and real and genuine friendship. We got to know people, and we truly honored them. There was never forcing or intrusive energy; it just was, and we were happier because of it.

The same is true of the Jewish faith. Americans found friends where we were compatible, and it didn't matter where others were from or what their faith was. We found souls we connected with and made great, often lifelong, friends, and the experience was genuine, kind, and loving.

The same issue of "anti-semitism, can be applied here: are you "racist?" The word "racist" has come to be defined with an energy, but for some reason, despite the absolute seismic shifts in population majorities across America and criminal successions, Whites were the only ones who would be labeled racist, even in those times when they themselves were being victimized. Essentially, a good human would be blamed for the crimes of another because of their race, and this blame-shifting was not an isolated case; it became the "status quo," a societal normalcy. The most relevant question for today is: are you living in fear, are you self protective?

We have come a long way since the "Civil War era," but it isn't entirely the most positive direction if innocent White victims are being victimized, killed, and placed into a slavery so ugly, demeaning, and grave. Yes, the tables have turned, yet not in a positive direction, but in a ruthless, punishing, cruel, and evil direction. This is a painful reality for many who are now being targeted because of their race.

We didn't realize that politics would take such an ugly turn, that Whites would be the dominant-victims of our century. Yet here we are, being targeted by everyone and all who determine that Whites should suffer simply because of their race. Race targeting of Whites has created a profound sense of fear, anger, and uncertainty among those who have been victimized.

We are a far cry from forty years ago. For example, imagine a young blonde female college student walking to class in Ohio. Minding her own business, she notices a Black, Hispanic, and foreign mob. They begin to approach her. The insults and attacks begin. The group surrounds her before attacking her. They assault her until her body is left lifeless on the ground, bloodied and bruised. For no other reason, they attacked her because of the color of her skin and hair. She was White. They hate Whites.

White victims can feel the piercing energy of racism, and there are many who have fully chosen evil, and are active in working toward ways to victimize, hurt, and prey on the innocent White victim. This is the societal wavelength today, a dark turn. Where we used to meet friends, now we are met with fear.

Are we happy? Are we safe? Not quite. We are living in fear. The truth is, we are getting hurt and attacked by people who have not just chosen evil, but who have been fully consumed by it, and then they blame you.

Quite successfully, they are active in their evil campaigns. We are enduring political and religious race war. We are simply enduring, evil.
