

Keeping U.S. Sovereignty in Times of Conflict and War

Soviet–Ghanaian partnership

Ghana–Russia Relations

Ghana is not formally considered a military ally of Russia, but it maintains friendly, longstanding diplomatic and economic relations with Moscow. While both countries have cooperated on economic projects and military training, Ghana does not take a side in the Russia–Ukraine conflict, operating under a policy of non-alignment.

Key aspects of Ghana–Russia relations include:

- Growing economic ties: Russia is a supplier of petroleum products to Ghana and holds agreements in areas such as nuclear energy.
- Diplomatic relations: The two countries have maintained, at times, close diplomatic ties for over six decades, following the Soviet–Ghanaian partnership established during the Cold War era.
- Ukraine conflict context: Russia is actively seeking recruitment support related to the war, with Ghana identified as a potential partner. Ghana has acknowledged and engaged in discussions regarding its citizens being recruited.

Overall, Ghana is not part of Russia’s core group of military allies but acts as a cooperative partner focused on trade and technical collaboration.

- War Recruitment: Russia is actively seeking recruitment support related to the war, with Ghana identified as a potential partner. Ghana has acknowledged and engaged discussions regarding its citizens being recruited.

Position Context:

The United States maintains its sovereign position in times of conflict, prioritizing national security and the protection of its citizens while monitoring international partnerships and influence.