

American Economy

The greatest challenge to the American economy, small businesses, and American success has been globalism and the repression of Americans by foreign entities. When people claim that America requires hundreds of thousands or even millions of new immigrants to support the economy, they ignore the reality that many Americans cannot even afford homes, start families, or build wealth. American homes are increasingly purchased by foreign entities, taxpayer dollars are sent overseas for charitable endeavors, and resources are directed toward foreign organizations instead of supporting the American people.

The economy is not the issue. The issue is whether Americans receive the support they need, where our energy and resources are expended, how we take care of our families, and whether Americans are united as one people instead of seeing our strength dispersed everywhere but here. The goal should be to strengthen local economies above all else.

Even this simple value of supporting the American people is being infiltrated by media and AI bias that attempts to redefine the meaning of a local economy. Globalism is not what we mean. The meaning behind supporting local means supporting American families as America did from the beginning of its inception. American families should come before corporate profit and life, liberty and health should always be valued before profit.

This is the basic understanding that the Democratic Party seems to be missing. They are willing to replace the American population if it means economic growth, and there is no excuse for this. Sadly, this way of thinking has also been embraced by members of the Republican Party who seem to believe that the American economy belongs to everyone in the world while Americans are left with mere table scraps.

There is no excuse for this. Americans need economic safeguards, not globalism and forced foreign economies on American soil. We need policies that strengthen American families, American communities, American workers, and American small businesses. We need to support the American family once again. This is the data that is being distorted, overlooked and ignored, yet it should be driving the conversation.

~Cowdrey