Coercive guilt, modern colonialism, social entitlement, forced immigration, and foreign cultural assimilation can be understood as forms of force, fraud, and coercion. If something goes against the conscience of an individual, yet is forced upon them anyway, it may be experienced as a form of social and cultural slavery.

Coercive Guilt, Modern Colonialism, Forced Assimilation, and Social Slavery

Here, it is celebrated by some modern colonizers to harm and disrupt domestic and native American populations. They burn the American flag while hoisting a foreign one. The entitlement is beyond reason, understanding, or mutual consideration.

Though many are not in the country lawfully or respectful of Americans and their laws, they remain and also support others staying as well. Smugglers, cartels, and traffickers even appear at protests in support, waving the Mexican flag.

Furthermore, they not only stay, but also claim that states belonging to native American populations belong to their separate country, Mexico. There is little respect, empathy, or compassion shown toward the American people. The psychological warfare continues. To many, this experience appears grounded in a sense of entitlement to territory that rightfully belongs to the American people.

Sadly, they garner support from other supporters, which has caused severe social decline and destabilized relations. It is a deep betrayal of trust, loyalty, and friendship. Americans remain patient; however, America is for the American people, not foreign activists who burn our flag and harm our people.

“Flag-icide — Burning one flag and replacing it with another.”

“Colonialism — Foreign domination of territories and peoples.”
