

MOVING ALONG

We progressed nicely in week two. All teams checking off some more boxes. Seems like the weekends provide the more interesting scores so far. Big scores again on Saturday and Sunday.

Few of them helped our players unfortunately. 14 for the Phils, 15 for Texas, 20 for Oakland! Holy smoke- - The A's went whole month's last year without scoring 20 runs and they did it in one day last week. I'm not sure how much better they are this year. It appears the whole division is down this season.

The Padres stopped at 13 Saturday to help out Kevin Joel with a needed big number. The first team to net the elusive butterfly that is the 13. That also puts KJ in a 4 way tie for the early lead with 9 numbers taken. But having the 13 makes him the one to watch.

Only 1 of the 4 teams tied at the top have winning records so like I said at the beginning, standings don't count for much in this pool.

I will be away for a few days into early next week. I will still work with Bob on making sure we agree on the standings but won't be writing a brief. Bob will be sending out the standings as usual early next week and may or may not add the bells and whistles which are normally my sole contribution to the pool.

Til next time.
