Entrepreneurs in China, South Korea, Russia, and Japan have signed a Memorandum of Understanding that seeks to create the Asia Super Grid. It will transmit electrical power from renewable sources from areas of the world that are best able to produce it to consumers in other parts of the world. The idea is dependent on development of an ultra-high voltage grid operating at more than 1,000 kilovolts AC and 800 kilovolts DC over thousands of kilometers. It envisions interconnecting grids across regions, nations, and even continents with a capacity of over 10 gigawatts. <http://cleantechnica.com/2016/09/21/china-japan-russia-south-korea-plan-renewable-energy-super-grid/>

It envisions interconnecting grids across regions, nations, and even continents with a capacity of over 10 gigawatts. <http://cleantechnica.com/2016/09/21/china-japan-russia-south-korea-plan-renewable-energy-super-grid/>

Tesla refers in INVENTIONS to a "pencil-thin" line of light that was created with this device. It is my belief that Tesla not only invented the ruby laser in 1893, but he also demonstrated it and published it's results. The problem with the device was that it was set up so as to "vaporize," or destroy, the button, so that the laser effects were probably short-lived. Chris Edwards posted in Nikola Tesla Replications.

Nikola Tesla's Wardenclyffe Tower - (This is an animation of the top of the tower. From investigations of Tesla's patents and writings; here is a good modern analysis. The tower acts as an electro-static generator using energy derived from the hydro system and/or density/ocean mass engine designed below the tower. Under the tower was built into the Long Island aquifer and to the Atlantic Ocean. Some allege that the Wardenclyffe tower needed an external generator. The latest documentary called "Tesla's Niagara" admitted Wardenclyffe was to be installed there in 1895 to send negative ions to the atmosphere for reception using a distant "radiant energy receiver" of 1901. Tesla describes both methods of low frequency radio frequency pressure waves in the ether from tuned coils or long underground tubes used for radio communications. A wave complex including the concentric sound waves and what he describes as "standing longitudinal surface waves" (scalar) in a nodal system of towers used for power. Tesla's remote control and logic gates patents provide for analog or digital "multiplexing" of waves for signal security. In the final version, the 1000 cupola bulbs provide the high frequency UV for Li-Fi communications to your solar wallpaper or to a solar panel. One method using the special half-sphere vacuum tube bulbs that were to be added to the outside of the cupola allows for taking pictures of a distant location or taking pictures of the atmosphere near the tower using the high-frequency UV. Think Kodak Instamatic. The electrical oscillations use a method of magnifying transmission using superconductivity of cold temperature gasses contained in or below the tower in the spiral staircase. Since the Earth is a conductor of electricity, the system would be reversible in order to create artificial lightning. Lightning containing it's voltage, speed and it's striking the earth. Ozone is created at ground level. The electrical waves and sound waves created run in "concentric waves". Continuing... It has been proposed that a cold temperature method used in "Nuclear" power plants is possible. The electrical pressures created in his system automatically create and accumulate the superconductive gasses or liquids, Argon, Xenon, Krypton, H3, O3, N3 ... from the interaction of radioactive matter, neutrons, high pressure and sea-water. This accumulation of gasses causes a further collapse of the temperature and increases the magnifying transmission. (Keeping in mind that Westinghouse still makes "Nuke" plants. These plants officially create superconductive gasses like Krypton). Further, artificial negative ion generators on "aircraft" can create "chemtrails" (artificial electrified clouds) to generate pathways for Tesla's ascribed "cloudborn electric wavelets" for reception at distant locations. Tesla's last communications with his co-designer Stanford White, was regarding the spark-gap, plasma containment mechanism within the tower structure. The tower was built into solid granite in order to "ring the earth like a bell". Granite uniquely makes sounds when under stress or vibration. Both the receiving devices and sending device will exhibit "negative resistance". The addition of capacity and reduction of resistance to or near zero allows for the system to reach infinite power.)

Air was full of luminescence, people radiated a mysterious shine or glow. They seemed to be (as) ghosts. Thunder heard 25 miles away" <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=5x5qyaXX3Zc>

Nikola Tesla created St. Elmo's Fire in 1899 while testing out a Tesla coil at his laboratory in Colorado Springs. St. Elmo's fire was seen around the coil and was said to have lit up the wings of butterflies with blue halos as they flew around.[21] Shortly before the crash of the (Wirelessly powered, (Thermite-like) Lead Zeppelin skinned) Luftschiffbau Zeppelin's Hindenburg in 1937, Professor Mark Heald of Princeton saw St. Elmo's Fire flickering along the airship's back a minute before the fire broke out.

Nikola Tesla created St. Elmo's Fire in 1899 while testing out a Tesla coil at his laboratory in Colorado Springs. St. Elmo's fire was seen around the coil and was said to have lit up the wings of butterflies with blue halos as they flew around.[21] Shortly before the crash of the (Wirelessly powered, (Thermite-like) Lead Zeppelin skinned) Luftschiffbau Zeppelin's Hindenburg in 1937, Professor Mark Heald of Princeton saw St. Elmo's Fire flickering along the airship's back a minute before the fire broke out.

Brooklyn Eagle 1931 "I have harnessed the cosmic rays caused them to operate a motive device" "25 years ago I began my efforts to harness the cosmic rays and I have succeeded" 1933 New York American, Device to Harness Cosmic Energy "power derived of the universe, cosmic energy, the sun present everywhere in unlimited quantities". The Tesla electric "Back to the Future" car anecdote refers to a supposed Tesla invention described by a Peter Savo (nephew of Tesla), to one Derek Ahers on 9/16/1967. Savo said that Tesla took him to Buffalo, NY in 1931 and showed him a modified Pierce-Arrow car. Tesla had the stock gasoline engine replaced with a brushless AC motor run by a 'cosmic energy receiver' and was driven 50 miles at speeds of up to 88 mph during an 8-day period. Other U.S. patents have been filed: (#3,811,058, #3,879,622, and #4,151,4310), for example, for motors that run exclusively on permanent energy, seemingly tapping into energy circulating through the earth's magnetic field. The first two require a feedback network in order to be self-running. Years later, in 1933, he was more pointed in his remarks about the introduction of his fuel-less generator. In the Philadelphia Public Ledger of November 2, is an interview with Tesla under the headline: Tesla 'Harnesses' Cosmic Energy. In it he was asked whether the sudden introduction of his principle would upset the present economic system, Dr. Tesla replied, "It is badly upset already." He added: "Now as never before was the time ripe for the development of new resources." At a press conference to celebrate his 76th birthday, Tesla announced that he had invented a cosmic-ray motor.

In 1931, under the financing of Tesla Pierce-Arrow and George Westinghouse, a 1931 Pierce-Arrow was selected to be tested at the factory grounds in Buffalo, N.Y. The standard internal combustion engine was removed and an 80-H.P. 1800 r.p.m electric motor installed to the clutch and transmission. The A.C. motor measured 40 inches long and 30 inches in diameter and the power leads were left standing in the air - no external power source. At the appointed time, Nikola Tesla arrived from New York City and inspected the Pierce-Arrow automobile. He then went to a local radio store and purchased a handful of tubes, wires and assorted resistors. A box measuring 24 inches long, 12 inches wide and 6 inches high was assembled housing the circuit. The box was then placed on the front seat and had its wires connected to the air cooled, brushless motor. Two rods 1/4" in diameter stuck out of the box about 3" in length. Mr. Tesla got into the driver's seat, pushed the two rods in and stated, "We now have power." He put the car into gear and it moved forward. This vehicle, powered by an A.C. motor, was driven to speeds of 90 m.p.h. and performed better than any internal combustion engine of its day. One week was spent testing the vehicle. Several newspapers in Buffalo reported this test. When asked where the power came from, Tesla replied, "From the ethers all around us."... In the 1970's, an inventor used an Ev-Gray generator, which intensified battery current, the voltage being induced to the field coils by a very simple programmer (sequencer). By allowing the motor to charge separate batteries as the device ran, phenomenally tiny currents were needed. The device was tested at the Crosby Research Institute of Beverly Hills, Ca., a 10- horsepower EMA motor ran for over a week (9 days) on four standard automobile batteries. The inventors estimated that a 50-horsepower electric motor could traverse 300 miles at 50 m.p.h. before needing a re-charge. <http://peswiki.com/directory:teslas-pierce-arrow> -- More at <http://nikolateslasolar.blogspot.com/>

The Origin of Nuclear Power's "Too Cheap To Meter" Phrase: U.S. AEC civilian nuclear program included the new 1954 "Atomic Energy Act", President Eisenhower's "Atoms for Peace" and medical uses of reactor-produced isotopes. Coincidentally, In 1954, John G Trump and government officials visit Tesla's storage unit in New York and go through its trunks, safe, multi-resistant box and paperwork. Atomic Energy Chairman stated "he expected his children and grandchildren would have power "too cheap to be metered", "as low as the price for Hydro-Electric Power". Although this never technically happened, most Nuclear Power Plants are paid-off and generate power at less than 1 cent per KW/hr. The wholesale and retail prices of this energy are higher for a variety of reasons such as insurance, regulation and distribution. #nikolatesla #coloradosprings #lab That's Pike's Peak directly facing in the background. There are two pictures show Nikola Tesla's lab, with Pike's Peak directly in the background reportedly either 15 miles (the Prestige) due east or exactly 22 miles (80's documentary) due east of Pike's Peak or Downtown Colorado Springs. Exactly 22 miles would be at Schriever AFB, on Lockheed's parking lot, on Discoverer lane. <http://media.defense.gov/2006/Jul/24/2000547735/-1/-1/0/060427-F-0000X-003.JPG>

It has been noted that some "nuclear power plants" are coincidentally built on top of geothermal geography. Heavy metals from Uranium to Radium are mined from Granite. Also, Wardencllyffe could have been built on top of either a geothermal location below Rocky Point, LI and/or a Hydro project underground using the Long Island Aquifer and Long Island Sound. Originally, it's well known that Wardencllyffe towers were to be built at Hydro dams, starting with Niagara Falls.

<https://google.com/patents/US20110156494>

This patent of a "Wireless Energy Transfer System" in 2011 refers to 4 Nikola Tesla patents and this patent represents our modern system of radio communications and long distance power transfer by companies such as Sony, Xerox, Matsushita, LG, . -- "Such known system are built to support hundreds and in a few cases up to 2000 miles of distance. The loss factor in most of these systems, which are known as long-haul systems, is 7-10%, and they cost hundreds of millions of dollars to produce." -- While some attempts to use other forms of transmission in wired and wireless forms have been tried, there is no system that has been proven to scale or cover great distances or that supports millions of users and billions of devices which could be connected to such architecture.

[0007] <https://google.com/patents/US20110156494> -- The newest referring Patent is #US9393878, Jul 19, 2016 "Energy transfer with vehicles" <https://www.google.com/patents/US9393878>

There are multiple known methods of wireless energy transfer. One such technique is known as "radiative" energy transfer, which entails generating an electromagnetic field. Here, a special receiver acquires electromagnetic radiation that has not naturally dissipated in the air and converts the acquired electromagnetic radiation into electricity. The energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation can travel nearly three meters (approximately ten feet) to thereby keep a small battery charged. However, most of the energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation is lost before reaching the receiver and the power that does reach the receiver is extremely low. Nevertheless, such a technology, which has been pioneered by Powercast in Philadelphia, Pa., was deployed for the first time in 2008 by Philips in a small power application, such as lights on Christmas decorations.

Another known technique also relies on magnetic fields. However, this technique is still in the experimental stage, and operates based on principles of resonance. When two objects resonate at the same frequency, they transfer energy efficiently in much the same manner as a child that easily maintains momentum on a swing when he or she uses his or her legs to move in synchronization with the rhythm of the swing while it is in motion. The use of magnetic resonance allows the transfer of energy in useful quantities and almost entirely to the receiving device. However, as in the radiative method, the energy can travel only a distance of a few meters. Nevertheless, ever since its inventor, Marin Soljacic of MIT, presented his work at a conference in the autumn of 2008, he has continually but unsuccessfully tried to increase the effective distance beyond several feet. The technology pioneered by Martin loses more than 60% of the transmitted power at a distance greater than 6 feet.

[0009]

"Inductive coupling" is another way of transferring energy. Here, power or energy transfer in inductive coupling is not so much wireless as it is plugless or socketless. That is, power is sent on almost direct contact, for example, with a mat upon which gadgets can be placed to recharge. The method avoids the need for cables and connectors to charge gadgets, and can be built into many surfaces, such as car dashboards or office furniture. This system, with a few variations, is employed by start-ups such as Splashpower in Britain, WildCharge and Fulton Innovation in America.

[0010]

Instead of transferring power wirelessly, it may be worthwhile to transport fuel, such as coal, oil or hydrogen, in a conventional manner. It is clear that the cost of transporting fuel has increased drastically in recent years and, as such, it has become much more expensive to produce electricity with all variety of traditional transmission means. There are significant drawbacks to this method of energy supply. First of all, it requires an enormous amount of energy, transportation vehicles, and human labor. These requirements drive up the cost of the portable energy source. In addition, these energy sources often are hazardous; hydrogen, for example, ignites with ease. Also, the burning of many types of fuels pollutes the environment.

[0011]

Another option is to utilize a local power source, such as solar or wind power. However, the number of locations that are suitable for solar or wind power stations is limited. A particular climate is required, such as that of the Sahara desert for solar power and Texas, United States for wind power. There are many additional drawbacks to these power sources. The current technology for converting solar power into electrical power, photovoltaic cells, is extremely inefficient. Solar power is at this time unable to quench the world's demand for energy due to its inefficiency. One method of utilizing wind power is the installation of huge turbines in a consistently windy region. However, these installations demand open lands prone to consistent, strong wind currents; in other words, they are not generally placed in communities. Thus, the wind power must be transported; this is usually performed by power lines.

[0012]

There are many methods of voice and data communication, including the Internet, the phone lines, the radio broadcast system and mobile cell phones. These systems either utilize transmission lines of some sort, or they use electromagnetic radiation. Transmission lines have a high initial cost and an upkeep cost. Electromagnetic radiation is an inefficient method of transfer since its power loss is proportional to the square of the distance from the emitting source. In addition, electromagnetic radiation has a potentially harmful effect on humans and other life forms.

It is therefore apparent there is a need for a wireless transmission system for voice, data and power.

SUMMARY OF THE INVENTION

[0014]

Disclosed is a system for transmitting power, voice and data without wires or with no more than one connection. The system is configured to provide communication between unlimited numbers of electronic devices, or to connect these devices to an unlimited number of outside networks that are located externally to the disclosed system to thereby enable high-speed voice and data communications over a single resonant connection. The disclosed system utilizes at least one transmitter and one receiver, which may have the same or different configurations, such that an induced oscillating electric current, which occurs at the resonant frequency of a transmitter connected to Earth or a physical body, such as a lake or plane or other body with defined parameters, can resonate with one or multiple devices tuned to the same frequency. -- Newest referring Patent #US9393878 Sep 23, 2014 Jul 19, 2016 "Energy transfer with vehicles" <https://www.google.com/patents/US9393878>

Will the robots be able to destroy the billions of solar panels, solar grids, wind turbines (made of the strongest steel known to man), hydro plants, and electric cars? BTW, the solar panels will have to be broken, cell by cell with a hammer. Hope the robots are good with roofs and hammers.

Tesla states in his 1919 Autobiography that Wardenclyffe at Shoreham LI was demolished on July 4th 1917, along with the Tesla/Marconi Station "Telefunken" in Sayville, LI in 1917 and ... In Margaret Cheney's book "Man out of Time", the not well known Tesla "Tuckerton" Radio Station was ceased by the U.S. government in 1917, all later to be replaced with RCA/GE by 1921. But Tesla states in 1919, "they are building more of them", referring to Tesla Towers!. After Tesla's autobiography, GE merged with Marconi in 1920, RCA was formed. By November 5th 1921, the first radio broadcast was sent from the President of the United States from the White House, using the new RCA system at Rocky Point, near Sayville. By 1943, after Tesla dies, in 1945-46, the Sperry Gyroscopic Company takes over office space with the Ford Company at Lake Success, LI and RCA at Rocky Point, LI. According to the Tesla FBI File, Henry Ford is alleged to be involved with Tesla's missing inventions, which were to be turned into "idea factories". In 1946, the United Nations had their headquarters at the Sperry Company. By 1973, Sperry merges with Remington Rand to create the Sperry-Rand Corporation. --

In Margaret Cheney's book "Man out of Time", the not well known Tesla "Tuckerton" Radio Station was ceased by the U.S. government in 1917, all later to be replaced with RCA/GE by 1921. But Tesla states in 1919, "they are building more of them", referring to Tesla Towers!. After Tesla's autobiography, GE merged with Marconi in 1920, RCA was formed. By November 5th 1921, the first radio broadcast was sent from the President of the United States from the White House, using the new RCA system at Rocky Point, near Sayville. By 1943, after Tesla dies, in 1945-46, the Sperry Gyroscope Company takes over office space with the Ford Company at Lake Success, LI and RCA at Rocky Point, LI. According to the Tesla FBI File, Henry Ford is alleged to be involved with Tesla's missing inventions, which were to be turned into "idea factories". In 1946, the United Nations had their headquarters at the Sperry Company. By 1973, Sperry merges with Remington Rand to create the Sperry-Rand Corporation. -- http://ethw.org/Possible\_Milestones\_for\_IEEE\_Long\_Island\_Section -- Tesla wins Nobel Prize in 1915-16, just prior to the seizure of the Tesla Stations. <https://youtube.com/watch?v=NZsMu0CoxF8> -- "Man Out of Time", a Nobel Affair <http://bookrags.com/studyguide-tesla-man-out-of-time/chapanal010.html> - Wardencllyffe Forfeited Dream <http://teslauniverse.com/nikola-tesla/articles/wardencllyffe-forfeited-dream>

After clearing the procedure with the appropriate authorities, Lee performed the Radiofrequency Ablation therapy on several women successfully. What he didn't know at the time was that other doctors had tried something similar — and failed. Who knew why. Maybe they used the wrong kind of ablation needle. Lee found himself thinking of these things as he listened to the piano music.

Composing was about creating a desired mood, a tonality, a sentiment. Acesa didn't require narcotics, the incisions were tiny. Patients, like some of the Hollywood actresses he treated, could be back to work within days. It got FDA approval three years ago. California state insurance didn't cover it. But other states, like New Mexico, Oklahoma, Montana and a few others, did. Shame, that. He'd have to look into it. <http://www.hollywoodreporter.com/news/beverly-hills-doctor-venice-attack-918703>

After clearing the procedure with the appropriate authorities, Lee performed the Radiofrequency Ablation therapy on several women successfully. What he didn't know at the time was that other doctors had tried something similar — and failed. Who knew why. Maybe they used the wrong kind of ablation needle. Lee found himself thinking of these things as he listened to the piano music. Composing was about creating a desired mood, a tonality, a sentiment. Accessa didn't require narcotics, the incisions were tiny. Patients, like some of the Hollywood actresses he treated, could be back to work within days. It got FDA approval three years ago. A 2011 patent that refers to Nikola Tesla's wireless works, describes Earth as an "Ellipse". Accident? Comments?? Other Tesla patents like controlling his Automata, show "straight lines on the horizon" and ULF like HAARP show radio "dissipation into space" -- An analogy of the propagation of electromagnetic waves may be drawn between the motions of a ripple on the surface of a pool filled with water. In the case of such a water-filled pool, it takes very little energy to move the water on the surface of the pool and, at the right frequency, the energy will create very high waves and lots of power at the edge of the pool where the "standing wave" will hit against a solid surface. Bearing this in mind, in the system of the disclosed invention, the receiving tower is "hit" by standing waves, and unless the receiving tower absorbs the electrostatic energy of the standing waves, very little loss or power is needed at the transmitting tower to maintain the motion of the wave. Due to the elliptical surface of the Earth, it is possible to convert 97% of the energy of a standing wave while transmitting power to every point on the surface of the Earth.

<https://google.com/patents/US20110156494> -- Nikola Tesla on "Concentric Waves" in Water with his 1914 "Fountain" Patent

#1,113,716 he states "The present invention is a departure from such practice in that it relies principally on the fascinating spectacle of a large mass of fluid in motion and the display of seemingly great power." <https://www.google.com/patents/US1113716>

The unmanned drones and laser-controlled missiles that Tesla feared rained a dreadful onslaught on his birthplace in Croatia during the April–June 1999 NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization) campaign and endangered an archive of his legacy. The Tesla Museum in Belgrade is dedicated to the archival and storage of 150,000 documents of historic importance by and to Tesla. Its director, Dr Branimir Jovanovic, successfully prevailed on six U.S. senators to declare the Tesla Museum a world treasure. Despite the total destruction of every nearby building, NATO bombers successfully spared the museum (Jovanovic B, written communication, June 1999).

An analogy of the propagation of electromagnetic waves may be drawn between the motions of a ripple on the surface of a pool filled with water. In the case of such a water-filled pool, it takes very little energy to move the water on the surface of the pool and, at the right frequency, the energy will create very high waves and lots of power at the edge of the pool where the "standing wave" will hit against a solid surface. Bearing this in mind, in the system of the disclosed invention, the receiving tower is "hit" by standing waves, and unless the receiving tower absorbs the electrostatic energy of the standing waves, very little loss or power is needed at the transmitting tower to maintain the motion of the wave. Due to the elliptical surface of the Earth, it is possible to convert 97% of the energy of a standing wave while transmitting power to every point on the surface of the Earth.

Bearing this in mind, in the system of the disclosed invention, the receiving tower is "hit" by standing waves, and unless the receiving tower absorbs the electrostatic energy of the standing waves, very little loss or power is needed at the transmitting tower to maintain the motion of the wave. Due to the elliptical surface of the Earth, it is possible to convert 97% of the energy of a standing wave while transmitting power to every point on the surface of the Earth.

An analogy of the propagation of electromagnetic waves may be drawn between the motions of a ripple on the surface of a pool filed with water. In the case of such a water-filled pool, it takes very little energy to move the water on the surface of the pool and, at the right frequency, the energy will create very high waves and lots of power at the edge of the pool where the "standing wave" will hit against a solid surface. This patent of a "Wireless Energy Transfer System" in 2011 refers to 4 Nikola Tesla patents and this patent represents our modern system of radio and long distance power transfer by companies such as Sony, Xerox, Matsushita, LG -- "Such known system are built to support hundreds and in a few cases up to 2000 miles of distance. The loss factor in most of these systems, known as long-haul systems, is 7-10%, and they cost hundreds of millions of dollars to produce." -- While some attempts to use other forms of transmission in wired and wireless forms have been tried, there is no system that has been proven to scale or cover great distances or that supports millions of users and billions of devices which could be connected to such architecture. [0007]

<https://www.google.com/patents/US20110156494> -- The newest referring Patent is #US9393878 on Jul 19, 2016 for "Energy transfer with vehicles" <https://www.google.com/patents/US9393878>

There are multiple known methods of wireless energy transfer. One such technique is known as "radiative" energy transfer, which entails generating an electromagnetic field. Here, a special receiver acquires electromagnetic radiation that has not naturally dissipated in the air and converts the acquired electromagnetic radiation into electricity. The energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation can travel nearly three meters (approximately ten feet) to thereby keep a small battery charged. However, most of the energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation is lost before reaching the receiver and the power that does reach the receiver is extremely low. Nevertheless, such a technology, which has been pioneered by Powercast in Philadelphia, Pa., was deployed for the first time in 2008 by Philips in a small power application, such as lights on Christmas decorations.

Another known technique also relies on magnetic fields. However, this technique is still in the experimental stage, and operates based on principles of resonance. When two objects resonate at the same frequency, they transfer energy efficiently in much the same manner as a child that easily maintains momentum on a swing when he or she uses his or her legs to move in synchronization with the rhythm of the swing while it is in motion. The use of magnetic resonance allows the transfer of energy in useful quantities and almost entirely to the receiving device. However, as in the radiative method, the energy can travel only a distance of a few meters. Nevertheless, ever since its inventor, Marin Soljacic of MIT, presented his work at a conference in the autumn of 2008, he has continually but unsuccessfully tried to increase the effective distance beyond several feet. The technology pioneered by Martin loses more than 60% of the transmitted power at a distance greater than 6 feet.

[0009]

"Inductive coupling" is another way of transferring energy. Here, power or energy transfer in inductive coupling is not so much wireless as it is plugless or socketless. That is, power is sent on almost direct contact, for example, with a mat upon which gadgets can be placed to recharge. The method avoids the need for cables and connectors to charge gadgets, and can be built into many surfaces, such as car dashboards or office furniture. This system, with a few variations, is employed by start-ups such as Splashpower in Britain, WildCharge and Fulton Innovation in America.

[0010]

Instead of transferring power wirelessly, it may be worthwhile to transport fuel, such as coal, oil or hydrogen, in a conventional manner. It is clear that the cost of transporting fuel has increased drastically in recent years and, as such, it has become much more expensive to produce electricity with all variety of traditional transmission means. There are significant drawbacks to this method of energy supply. First of all, it requires an enormous amount of energy, transportation vehicles, and human labor. These requirements drive up the cost of the portable energy source. In addition, these energy sources often are hazardous; hydrogen, for example, ignites with ease. Also, the burning of many types of fuels pollutes the environment.

[0011]

Another option is to utilize a local power source, such as solar or wind power. However, the number of locations that are suitable for solar or wind power stations is limited. A particular climate is required, such as that of the Sahara desert for solar power and Texas, United States for wind power. There are many additional drawbacks to these power sources. The current technology for converting solar power into electrical power, photovoltaic cells, is extremely inefficient. Solar power is at this time unable to quench the world's demand for energy due to its inefficiency. One method of utilizing wind power is the installation of huge turbines in a consistently windy region. However, these installations demand open lands prone to consistent, strong wind currents; in other words, they are not generally placed in communities. Thus, the wind power must be transported; this is usually performed by power lines.

There are many methods of voice and data communication, including the Internet, the phone lines, the radio broadcast system and mobile cell phones. These systems either utilize transmission lines of some sort, or they use electromagnetic radiation. Transmission lines have a high initial cost and an upkeep cost. Electromagnetic radiation is an inefficient method of transfer since its power loss is proportional to the square of the distance from the emitting source. In addition, electromagnetic radiation has a potentially harmful effect on humans and other life forms.

It is therefore apparent there is a need for a wireless transmission system for voice, data and power.

[0014]

Disclosed is a system for transmitting power, voice and data without wires or with no more than one connection. The system is configured to provide communication between unlimited numbers of electronic devices, or to connect these devices to an unlimited number of outside networks that are located externally to the disclosed system to thereby enable high-speed voice and data communications over a single resonant connection. The disclosed system utilizes at least one transmitter and one receiver, which may have the same or different configurations, such that an induced oscillating electric current, which occurs at the resonant frequency of a transmitter connected to Earth or a physical body, such as a lake or plane or other body with defined parameters, can resonate with one or multiple devices tuned to the same frequency.

This patent of a "Wireless Energy Transfer System" in 2011 refers to 4 Nikola Tesla patents and this patent represents our modern system of radio and long distance power transfer by companies such as Sony, Xerox, Matsushita, LG -- "Such known system are built to support hundreds and in a few cases up to 2000 miles of distance. The loss factor in most of these systems, known as long-haul systems, is 7-10%, and they cost hundreds of millions of dollars to produce." -- While some attempts to use other forms of transmission in wired and wireless forms have been tried, there is no system that has been proven to scale or cover great distances or that supports millions of users and billions of devices which could be connected to such architecture. [0007]

<https://www.google.com/patents/US20110156494> -- The newest referring Patent is #US9393878 on Jul 19, 2016 for "Energy transfer with vehicles" <https://www.google.com/patents/US9393878>

There are multiple known methods of wireless energy transfer. One such technique is known as "radiative" energy transfer, which entails generating an electromagnetic field. Here, a special receiver acquires electromagnetic radiation that has not naturally dissipated in the air and converts the acquired electromagnetic radiation into electricity. The energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation can travel nearly three meters (approximately ten feet) to thereby keep a small battery charged. However, most of the energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation is lost before reaching the receiver and the power that does reach the receiver is extremely low. Nevertheless, such a technology, which has been pioneered by Powercast in Philadelphia, Pa., was deployed for the first time in 2008 by Philips in a small power application, such as lights on Christmas decorations.

Another known technique also relies on magnetic fields. However, this technique is still in the experimental stage, and operates based on principles of resonance. When two objects resonate at the same frequency, they transfer energy efficiently in much the same manner as a child that easily maintains momentum on a swing when he or she uses his or her legs to move in synchronization with the rhythm of the swing while it is in motion. The use of magnetic resonance allows the transfer of energy in useful quantities and almost entirely to the receiving device. However, as in the radiative method, the energy can travel only a distance of a few meters. Nevertheless, ever since its inventor, Marin Soljacic of MIT, presented his work at a conference in the autumn of 2008, he has continually but unsuccessfully tried to increase the effective distance beyond several feet. The technology pioneered by Martin loses more than 60% of the transmitted power at a distance greater than 6 feet.

[0009]

"Inductive coupling" is another way of transferring energy. Here, power or energy transfer in inductive coupling is not so much wireless as it is plugless or socketless. That is, power is sent on almost direct contact, for example, with a mat upon which gadgets can be placed to recharge. The method avoids the need for cables and connectors to charge gadgets, and can be built into many surfaces, such as car dashboards or office furniture. This system, with a few variations, is employed by start-ups such as Splashpower in Britain, WildCharge and Fulton Innovation in America.

[0010]

Instead of transferring power wirelessly, it may be worthwhile to transport fuel, such as coal, oil or hydrogen, in a conventional manner. It is clear that the cost of transporting fuel has increased drastically in recent years and, as such, it has become much more expensive to produce electricity with all variety of traditional transmission means. There are significant drawbacks to this method of energy supply. First of all, it requires an enormous amount of energy, transportation vehicles, and human labor. These requirements drive up the cost of the portable energy source. In addition, these energy sources often are hazardous; hydrogen, for example, ignites with ease. Also, the burning of many types of fuels pollutes the environment.

[0011]

Another option is to utilize a local power source, such as solar or wind power. However, the number of locations that are suitable for solar or wind power stations is limited. A particular climate is required, such as that of the Sahara desert for solar power and Texas, United States for wind power. There are many additional drawbacks to these power sources. The current technology for converting solar power into electrical power, photovoltaic cells, is extremely inefficient. Solar power is at this time unable to quench the world's demand for energy due to its inefficiency. One method of utilizing wind power is the installation of huge turbines in a consistently windy region. However, these installations demand open lands prone to consistent, strong wind currents; in other words, they are not generally placed in communities. Thus, the wind power must be transported; this is usually performed by power lines.

[0012]

There are many methods of voice and data communication, including the Internet, the phone lines, the radio broadcast system and mobile cell phones. These systems either utilize transmission lines of some sort, or they use electromagnetic radiation. Transmission lines have a high initial cost and an upkeep cost. Electromagnetic radiation is an inefficient method of transfer since its power loss is proportional to the square of the distance from the emitting source. In addition, electromagnetic radiation has a potentially harmful effect on humans and other life forms.

It is therefore apparent there is a need for a wireless transmission system for voice, data and power.

SUMMARY OF THE INVENTION

[0014]

Disclosed is a system for transmitting power, voice and data without wires or with no more than one connection. The system is configured to provide communication between unlimited numbers of electronic devices, or to connect these devices to an unlimited number of outside networks that are located externally to the disclosed system to thereby enable high-speed voice and data communications over a single resonant connection. The disclosed system utilizes at least one transmitter and one receiver, which may have the same or different configurations, such that an induced oscillating electric current, which occurs at the resonant frequency of a transmitter connected to Earth or a physical body, such as a lake or plane or other body with defined parameters, can resonate with one or multiple devices tuned to the same frequency.

The use of magnetic resonance allows the transfer of energy in useful quantities and almost entirely to the receiving device. However, as in the radiative method, the energy can travel only a distance of a few meters. Nevertheless, ever since its inventor, Marin Soljacic of MIT, presented his work at a conference in the autumn of 2008, he has continually but unsuccessfully tried to increase the effective distance beyond several feet. The technology pioneered by Martin loses more than 60% of the transmitted power at a distance greater than 6 feet.

“Inductive coupling” is another way of transferring energy. Here, power or energy transfer in inductive coupling is not so much wireless as it is plugless or socketless. That is, power is sent on almost direct contact, for example, with a mat upon which gadgets can be placed to recharge. The method avoids the need for cables and connectors to charge gadgets, and can be built into many surfaces, such as car dashboards or office furniture. This system, with a few variations, is employed by start-ups such as Splashpower in Britain, WildCharge and Fulton Innovation in America.

[0010]

Instead of transferring power wirelessly, it may be worthwhile to transport fuel, such as coal, oil or hydrogen, in a conventional manner. It is clear that the cost of transporting fuel has increased drastically in recent years and, as such, it has become much more expensive to produce electricity with all variety of traditional transmission means. There are significant drawbacks to this method of energy supply. First of all, it requires an enormous amount of energy, transportation vehicles, and human labor. These requirements drive up the cost of the portable energy source. In addition, these energy sources often are hazardous; hydrogen, for example, ignites with ease. Also, the burning of many types of fuels pollutes the environment.

[0011]

Another option is to utilize a local power source, such as solar or wind power. However, the number of locations that are suitable for solar or wind power stations is limited. A particular climate is required, such as that of the Sahara desert for solar power and Texas, United States for wind power. There are many additional drawbacks to these power sources. The current technology for converting solar power into electrical power, photovoltaic cells, is extremely inefficient. Solar power is at this time unable to quench the world's demand for energy due to its inefficiency. One method of utilizing wind power is the installation of huge turbines in a consistently windy region. However, these installations demand open lands prone to consistent, strong wind currents; in other words, they are not generally placed in communities. Thus, the wind power must be transported; this is usually performed by power lines.

[0012]

There are many methods of voice and data communication, including the Internet, the phone lines, the radio broadcast system and mobile cell phones. These systems either utilize transmission lines of some sort, or they use electromagnetic radiation. Transmission lines have a high initial cost and an upkeep cost. Electromagnetic radiation is an inefficient method of transfer since its power loss is proportional to the square of the distance from the emitting source. In addition, electromagnetic radiation has a potentially harmful effect on humans and other life forms.

It is therefore apparent there is a need for a wireless transmission system for voice, data and power.

SUMMARY OF THE INVENTION

[0014]

Disclosed is a system for transmitting power, voice and data without wires or with no more than one connection. The system is configured to provide communication between unlimited numbers of electronic devices, or to connect these devices to an unlimited number of outside networks that are located externally to the disclosed system to thereby enable high-speed voice and data communications over a single resonant connection. The disclosed system utilizes at least one transmitter and one receiver, which may have the same or different configurations, such that an induced oscillating electric current, which occurs at the resonant frequency of a transmitter connected to Earth or a physical body, such as a lake or plane or other body with defined parameters, can resonate with one or multiple devices tuned to the same frequency.

This patent of a "Wireless Energy Transfer System" in 2011 refers to 4 Nikola Tesla patents and this patent represents our modern system of radio and long distance power transfer by companies such as Sony, Xerox, Matsushita, LG -- "Such known system are built to support hundreds and in a few cases up to 2000 miles of distance. The loss factor in most of these systems, known as long-haul systems, is 7-10%, and they cost hundreds of millions of dollars to produce." -- While some attempts to use other forms of transmission in wired and wireless forms have been tried, there is no system that has been proven to scale or cover great distances or that supports millions of users and billions of devices which could be connected to such architecture. There are multiple known methods of wireless energy transfer. One such technique is known as "radiative" energy transfer, which entails generating an electromagnetic field. Here, a special receiver acquires electromagnetic radiation that has not naturally dissipated in the air and converts the acquired electromagnetic radiation into electricity. The energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation can travel nearly three meters (approximately ten feet) to thereby keep a small battery charged. However, most of the energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation is lost before reaching the receiver and the power that does reach the receiver is extremely low. Nevertheless, such a technology, which has been pioneered by Powercast in Philadelphia, Pa., was deployed for the first time in 2008 by Philips in a small power application, such as lights on Christmas decorations.

Another known technique also relies on magnetic fields. However, this technique is still in the experimental stage, and operates based on principles of resonance. When two objects resonate at the same frequency, they transfer energy efficiently in much the same manner as a child that easily maintains momentum on a swing when he or she uses his or her legs to move in synchronization with the rhythm of the swing while it is in motion. The use of magnetic resonance allows the transfer of energy in useful quantities and almost entirely to the receiving device. Electromagnetic radiation is an inefficient method of transfer since its power loss is proportional to the square of the distance from the emitting source. In addition, electromagnetic radiation has a potentially harmful effect on humans and other life forms.

It is therefore apparent there is a need for a wireless transmission system for voice, data and power.

SUMMARY OF THE INVENTION

[0014]

Disclosed is a system for transmitting power, voice and data without wires or with no more than one connection. The system is configured to provide communication between unlimited numbers of electronic devices, or to connect these devices to an unlimited number of outside networks that are located externally to the disclosed system to thereby enable high-speed voice and data communications over a single resonant connection. The disclosed system utilizes at least one transmitter and one receiver, which may have the same or different configurations, such that an induced oscillating electric current, which occurs at the resonant frequency of a transmitter connected to Earth or a physical body, such as a lake or plane or other body with defined parameters, can resonate with one or multiple devices tuned to the same frequency.

This patent of a "Wireless Energy Transfer System" in 2011 refers to 4 Nikola Tesla patents and this patent represents our modern system of radio communications and long distance power transfer by companies such as Sony, Xerox, Matsushita, LG -- "Such known system are built to support hundreds and in a few cases up to 2000 miles of distance. The loss factor in most of these systems, known as long-haul systems, is 7-10%, and they cost hundreds of millions of dollars to produce." -- While some attempts to use other forms of transmission in wired and wireless forms have been tried, there is no system that has been proven to scale or cover great distances or that supports millions of users and billions of devices which could be connected to such architecture. [0007] <https://www.google.com/patents/US20110156494> -- The newest referring Patent is #US9393878 on Jul 19, 2016 for "Energy transfer with vehicles" <https://www.google.com/patents/US9393878>

There are multiple known methods of wireless energy transfer. One such technique is known as "radiative" energy transfer, which entails generating an electromagnetic field. Here, a special receiver acquires electromagnetic radiation that has not naturally dissipated in the air and converts the acquired electromagnetic radiation into electricity. The energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation can travel nearly three meters (approximately ten feet) to thereby keep a small battery charged. However, most of the energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation is lost before reaching the receiver and the power that does reach the receiver is extremely low. Nevertheless, such a technology, which has been pioneered by Powercast in Philadelphia, Pa., was deployed for the first time in 2008 by Philips in a small power application, such as lights on Christmas decorations.

Another known technique also relies on magnetic fields. However, this technique is still in the experimental stage, and operates based on principles of resonance. When two objects resonate at the same frequency, they transfer energy efficiently in much the same manner as a child that easily maintains momentum on a swing when he or she uses his or her legs to move in synchronization with the rhythm of the swing while it is in motion. The use of magnetic resonance allows the transfer of energy in useful quantities and almost entirely to the receiving device. However, as in the radiative method, the energy can travel only a distance of a few meters. Nevertheless, ever since its inventor, Marin Soljacic of MIT, presented his work at a conference in the autumn of 2008, he has continually but unsuccessfully tried to increase the effective distance beyond several feet. The technology pioneered by Martin loses more than 60% of the transmitted power at a distance greater than 6 feet.

[0009]

"Inductive coupling" is another way of transferring energy. Here, power or energy transfer in inductive coupling is not so much wireless as it is plugless or socketless. That is, power is sent on almost direct contact, for example, with a mat upon which gadgets can be placed to recharge. The method avoids the need for cables and connectors to charge gadgets, and can be built into many surfaces, such as car dashboards or office furniture. This system, with a few variations, is employed by start-ups such as Splashpower in Britain, WildCharge and Fulton Innovation in America.

Instead of transferring power wirelessly, it may be worthwhile to transport fuel, such as coal, oil or hydrogen, in a conventional manner. It is clear that the cost of transporting fuel has increased drastically in recent years and, as such, it has become much more expensive to produce electricity with all variety of traditional transmission means. There are significant drawbacks to this method of energy supply. First of all, it requires an enormous amount of energy, transportation vehicles, and human labor. These requirements drive up the cost of the portable energy source. In addition, these energy sources often are hazardous; hydrogen, for example, ignites with ease. Also, the burning of many types of fuels pollutes the environment.

Another option is to utilize a local power source, such as solar or wind power. However, the number of locations that are suitable for solar or wind power stations is limited. A particular climate is required, such as that of the Sahara desert for solar power and Texas, United States for wind power. There are many additional drawbacks to these power sources. The current technology for converting solar power into electrical power, photovoltaic cells, is extremely inefficient. Solar power is at this time unable to quench the world's demand for energy due to its inefficiency. One method of utilizing wind power is the installation of huge turbines in a consistently windy region. However, these installations demand open lands prone to consistent, strong wind currents; in other words, they are not generally placed in communities. Thus, the wind power must be transported; this is usually performed by power lines.

There are many methods of voice and data communication, including the Internet, the phone lines, the radio broadcast system and mobile cell phones. These systems either utilize transmission lines of some sort, or they use electromagnetic radiation. Transmission lines have a high initial cost and an upkeep cost. Electromagnetic radiation is an inefficient method of transfer since its power loss is proportional to the square of the distance from the emitting source. In addition, electromagnetic radiation has a potentially harmful effect on humans and other life forms.

[0007] <https://www.google.com/patents/US20110156494> -- The newest referring Patent is #US9393878 on Jul 19, 2016 for "Energy transfer with vehicles" <https://www.google.com/patents/US9393878>

There are multiple known methods of wireless energy transfer. One such technique is known as "radiative" energy transfer, which entails generating an electromagnetic field. Here, a special receiver acquires electromagnetic radiation that has not naturally dissipated in the air and converts the acquired electromagnetic radiation into electricity. The energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation can travel nearly three meters (approximately ten feet) to thereby keep a small battery charged. However, most of the energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation is lost before reaching the receiver and the power that does reach the receiver is extremely low. Nevertheless, such a technology, which has been pioneered by Powercast in Philadelphia, Pa., was deployed for the first time in 2008 by Philips in a small power application, such as lights on Christmas decorations.

Another known technique also relies on magnetic fields. However, this technique is still in the experimental stage, and operates based on principles of resonance. When two objects resonate at the same frequency, they transfer energy efficiently in much the same manner as a child that easily maintains momentum on a swing when he or she uses his or her legs to move in synchronization with the rhythm of the swing while it is in motion. The use of magnetic resonance allows the transfer of energy in useful quantities and almost entirely to the receiving device. However, as in the radiative method, the energy can travel only a distance of a few meters. Nevertheless, ever since its inventor, Marin Soljacic of MIT, presented his work at a conference in the autumn of 2008, he has continually but unsuccessfully tried to increase the effective distance beyond several feet. The technology pioneered by Martin loses more than 60% of the transmitted power at a distance greater than 6 feet.

[0009]

"Inductive coupling" is another way of transferring energy. Here, power or energy transfer in inductive coupling is not so much wireless as it is plugless or socketless. That is, power is sent on almost direct contact, for example, with a mat upon which gadgets can be placed to recharge. The method avoids the need for cables and connectors to charge gadgets, and can be built into many surfaces, such as car dashboards or office furniture. This system, with a few variations, is employed by start-ups such as Splashpower in Britain, WildCharge and Fulton Innovation in America.

[0010]

Instead of transferring power wirelessly, it may be worthwhile to transport fuel, such as coal, oil or hydrogen, in a conventional manner. It is clear that the cost of transporting fuel has increased drastically in recent years and, as such, it has become much more expensive to produce electricity with all variety of traditional transmission means. There are significant drawbacks to this method of energy supply. First of all, it requires an enormous amount of energy, transportation vehicles, and human labor. These requirements drive up the cost of the portable energy source. In addition, these energy sources often are hazardous; hydrogen, for example, ignites with ease. Also, the burning of many types of fuels pollutes the environment.

[0011]

Another option is to utilize a local power source, such as solar or wind power. However, the number of locations that are suitable for solar or wind power stations is limited. A particular climate is required, such as that of the Sahara desert for solar power and Texas, United States for wind power. There are many additional drawbacks to these power sources. The current technology for converting solar power into electrical power, photovoltaic cells, is extremely inefficient. Solar power is at this time unable to quench the world's demand for energy due to its inefficiency. One method of utilizing wind power is the installation of huge turbines in a consistently windy region. However, these installations demand open lands prone to consistent, strong wind currents; in other words, they are not generally placed in communities. Thus, the wind power must be transported; this is usually performed by power lines.

[0012]

There are many methods of voice and data communication, including the Internet, the phone lines, the radio broadcast system and mobile cell phones. These systems either utilize transmission lines of some sort, or they use electromagnetic radiation. Transmission lines have a high initial cost and an upkeep cost. Electromagnetic radiation is an inefficient method of transfer since its power loss is proportional to the square of the distance from the emitting source. In addition, electromagnetic radiation has a potentially harmful effect on humans and other life forms.

It is therefore apparent there is a need for a wireless transmission system for voice, data and power.

SUMMARY OF THE INVENTION

[0014]

Disclosed is a system for transmitting power, voice and data without wires or with no more than one connection. The system is configured to provide communication between unlimited numbers of electronic devices, or to connect these devices to an unlimited number of outside networks that are located externally to the disclosed system to thereby enable high-speed voice and data communications over a single resonant connection. The disclosed system utilizes at least one transmitter and one receiver, which may have the same or different configurations, such that an induced oscillating electric current, which occurs at the resonant frequency of a transmitter connected to Earth or a physical body, such as a lake or plane or other body with defined parameters, can resonate with one or multiple devices tuned to the same frequency.

Instead of transferring power wirelessly, it may be worthwhile to transport fuel, such as coal, oil or hydrogen, in a conventional manner. It is clear that the cost of transporting fuel has increased drastically in recent years and, as such, it has become much more expensive to produce electricity with all variety of traditional transmission means. There are significant drawbacks to this method of energy supply. First of all, it requires an enormous amount of energy, transportation vehicles, and human labor. These requirements drive up the cost of the portable energy source. In addition, these energy sources often are hazardous; hydrogen, for example, ignites with ease. Also, the burning of many types of fuels pollutes the environment.

[0011]

Another option is to utilize a local power source, such as solar or wind power. However, the number of locations that are suitable for solar or wind power stations is limited. A particular climate is required, such as that of the Sahara desert for solar power and Texas, United States for wind power. There are many additional drawbacks to these power sources. The current technology for converting solar power into electrical power, photovoltaic cells, is extremely inefficient. Solar power is at this time unable to quench the world's demand for energy due to its inefficiency. One method of utilizing wind power is the installation of huge turbines in a consistently windy region. However, these installations demand open lands prone to consistent, strong wind currents; in other words, they are not generally placed in communities. Thus, the wind power must be transported; this is usually performed by power lines.

[0012]

There are many methods of voice and data communication, including the Internet, the phone lines, the radio broadcast system and mobile cell phones. These systems either utilize transmission lines of some sort, or they use electromagnetic radiation. Transmission lines have a high initial cost and an upkeep cost. Electromagnetic radiation is an inefficient method of transfer since its power loss is proportional to the square of the distance from the emitting source. In addition, electromagnetic radiation has a potentially harmful effect on humans and other life forms.

It is therefore apparent there is a need for a wireless transmission system for voice, data and power.

SUMMARY OF THE INVENTION

[0014]

Disclosed is a system for transmitting power, voice and data without wires or with no more than one connection. The system is configured to provide communication between unlimited numbers of electronic devices, or to connect these devices to an unlimited number of outside networks that are located externally to the disclosed system to thereby enable high-speed voice and data communications over a single resonant connection. The disclosed system utilizes at least one transmitter and one receiver, which may have the same or different configurations, such that an induced oscillating electric current, which occurs at the resonant frequency of a transmitter connected to Earth or a physical body, such as a lake or plane or other body with defined parameters, can resonate with one or multiple devices tuned to the same frequency.

This patent of a "Wireless Energy Transfer System" in 2011 refers to 4 Nikola Tesla patents and this patent represents our modern system of radio communications and long distance power transfer by companies such as Sony, Xerox, Matsushita, LG, . -- "Such known system are built to support hundreds and in a few cases up to 2000 miles of distance. The loss factor in most of these systems, which are known as long-haul systems, is 7-10%, and they cost hundreds of millions of dollars to produce." -- While some attempts to use other forms of transmission in wired and wireless forms have been tried, there is no system that has been proven to scale or cover great distances or that supports millions of users and billions of devices which could be connected to such architecture. [0007] <https://www.google.com/patents/US20110156494> -- The newest referring Patent is #US9393878 on Jul 19, 2016 for "Energy transfer with vehicles" <https://www.google.com/patents/US9393878>

There are multiple known methods of wireless energy transfer. One such technique is known as "radiative" energy transfer, which entails generating an electromagnetic field. Here, a special receiver acquires electromagnetic radiation that has not naturally dissipated in the air and converts the acquired electromagnetic radiation into electricity. The energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation can travel nearly three meters (approximately ten feet) to thereby keep a small battery charged. However, most of the energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation is lost before reaching the receiver and the power that does reach the receiver is extremely low. Nevertheless, such a technology, which has been pioneered by Powercast in Philadelphia, Pa., was deployed for the first time in 2008 by Philips in a small power application, such as lights on Christmas decorations.

Another known technique also relies on magnetic fields. However, this technique is still in the experimental stage, and operates based on principles of resonance. When two objects resonate at the same frequency, they transfer energy efficiently in much the same manner as a child that easily maintains momentum on a swing when he or she uses his or her legs to move in synchronization with the rhythm of the swing while it is in motion. The use of magnetic resonance allows the transfer of energy in useful quantities and almost entirely to the receiving device. However, as in the radiative method, the energy can travel only a distance of a few meters. Nevertheless, ever since its inventor, Marin Soljacic of MIT, presented his work at a conference in the autumn of 2008, he has continually but unsuccessfully tried to increase the effective distance beyond several feet. The technology pioneered by Martin loses more than 60% of the transmitted power at a distance greater than 6 feet.

"Inductive coupling" is another way of transferring energy. Here, power or energy transfer in inductive coupling is not so much wireless as it is plugless or socketless. That is, power is sent on almost direct contact, for example, with a mat upon which gadgets can be placed to recharge. The method avoids the need for cables and connectors to charge gadgets, and can be built into many surfaces, such as car dashboards or office furniture. This system, with a few variations, is employed by start-ups such as Splashpower in Britain, WildCharge and Fulton Innovation in America.

The system is configured to provide communication between unlimited numbers of electronic devices, or to connect these devices to an unlimited number of outside networks that are located externally to the disclosed system to thereby enable high-speed voice and data communications over a single resonant connection. The disclosed system utilizes at least one transmitter and one receiver, which may have the same or different configurations, such that an induced oscillating electric current, which occurs at the resonant frequency of a transmitter connected to Earth or a physical body, such as a lake or plane or other body with defined parameters, can resonate with one or multiple devices tuned to the same frequency. -- Newest referring Patent #US9393878 Sep 23, 2014 Jul 19, 2016 "Energy transfer with vehicles" <https://www.google.com/patents/US9393878>

This patent of a "Wireless Energy Transfer System" in 2011 refers to 4 Nikola Tesla patents and this patent represents our modern system of radio communications and long distance power transfer by companies such as Sony, Xerox, Matsushita, LG -- "Such known systems are built to support hundreds and in a few cases up to 2000 miles. The loss factor in most of these systems, which are known as long-haul systems, is 7-10%, and cost hundreds of millions of dollars to produce." -- While some attempts to use other forms of transmission in wired and wireless forms have been tried, there is no system that has been proven to scale or cover great distances or that supports millions of users and billions of devices which could be connected to such architecture.

[0007] <https://google.com/patents/US20110156494> -- The newest referring Patent is #US9393878, Jul 19, 2016 "Energy transfer with vehicles" <https://www.google.com/patents/US9393878>

There are multiple known methods of wireless energy transfer. One such technique is known as "radiative" energy transfer, which entails generating an electromagnetic field. Here, a special receiver acquires electromagnetic radiation that has not naturally dissipated in the air and converts the acquired electromagnetic radiation into electricity. The energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation can travel nearly three meters (approximately ten feet) to thereby keep a small battery charged. However, most of the energy associated with the electromagnetic radiation is lost before reaching the receiver and the power that does reach the receiver is extremely low. Nevertheless, such a technology, which has been pioneered by Powercast in Philadelphia, Pa., was deployed for the first time in 2008 by Philips in a small power application, such as lights on Christmas decorations.

Another known technique also relies on magnetic fields. However, this technique is still in the experimental stage, and operates based on principles of resonance. When two objects resonate at the same frequency, they transfer energy efficiently in much the same manner as a child that easily maintains momentum on a swing when he or she uses his or her legs to move in synchronization with the rhythm of the swing while it is in motion. The use of magnetic resonance allows the transfer of energy in useful quantities and almost entirely to the receiving device. However, as in the radiative method, the energy can travel only a distance of a few meters. Nevertheless, ever since its inventor, Marin Soljacic of MIT, presented his work at a conference in the autumn of 2008, he has continually but unsuccessfully tried to increase the effective distance beyond several feet. The technology pioneered by Martin loses more than 60% of the transmitted power at a distance greater than 6 feet.

"Inductive coupling" is another way of transferring energy. Here, power or energy transfer in inductive coupling is not so much wireless as it is plugless or socketless. That is, power is sent on almost direct contact, for example, with a mat upon which gadgets can be placed to recharge. The method avoids the need for cables and connectors to charge gadgets, and can be built into many surfaces, such as car dashboards or office furniture. This system, with a few variations, is employed by start-ups such as Splashpower in Britain, WildCharge and Fulton Innovation in America.

[0010]

Instead of transferring power wirelessly, it may be worthwhile to transport fuel, such as coal, oil or hydrogen, in a conventional manner. It is clear that the cost of transporting fuel has increased drastically in recent years and, as such, it has become much more expensive to produce electricity with all variety of traditional transmission means. There are significant drawbacks to this method of energy supply. First of all, it requires an enormous amount of energy, transportation vehicles, and human labor. These requirements drive up the cost of the portable energy source. In addition, these energy sources often are hazardous; hydrogen, for example, ignites with ease. Also, the burning of many types of fuels pollutes the environment.

[0011]

Another option is to utilize a local power source, such as solar or wind power. However, the number of locations that are suitable for solar or wind power stations is limited. A particular climate is required, such as that of the Sahara desert for solar power and Texas, United States for wind power. There are many additional drawbacks to these power sources. The current technology for converting solar power into electrical power, photovoltaic cells, is extremely inefficient. Solar power is at this time unable to quench the world's demand for energy due to its inefficiency. One method of utilizing wind power is the installation of huge turbines in a consistently windy region. However, these installations demand open lands prone to consistent, strong wind currents; in other words, they are not generally placed in communities. Thus, the wind power must be transported; this is usually performed by power lines.

[0012]

There are many methods of voice and data communication, including the Internet, the phone lines, the radio broadcast system and mobile cell phones. These systems either utilize transmission lines of some sort, or they use electromagnetic radiation. Transmission lines have a high initial cost and an upkeep cost. Electromagnetic radiation is an inefficient method of transfer since its power loss is proportional to the square of the distance from the emitting source. In addition, electromagnetic radiation has a potentially harmful effect on humans and other life forms.

It is therefore apparent there is a need for a wireless transmission system for voice, data and power.

SUMMARY OF THE INVENTION

August 26th 2016 - Update on Aluminum manufacturing using "High-Speed Electro-Thermal Avalanche" -- McLaren's work in Marburg revealed a two-step process in which a thin sliver of the glass nearest the anode, called a depletion layer, becomes much more resistant to electrical current than the rest of the glass as alkali ions in the glass migrate away. This is followed by a catastrophic change in the layer, known as dielectric breakdown, which dramatically increases its conductivity. McLaren likens the process of dielectric breakdown to a high-speed avalanche, and using spectroscopic analysis with electro-thermal poling as a way to see what is happening in slow motion. #nikolatesla #magnetism As regards magnetism, the molecules of the various bodies behave like hollow beams partly filled with a heavy fluid and balanced in the middle in the manner of a see-saw. Evidently some disturbing influence exists in nature which causes each molecule, like such a beam, to tilt either one or the other way. If the molecules are tilted one way, the body is magnetic; if they are tilted the other way, the body is non-magnetic; but both positions are stable, as they would be in the case of the hollow beam, owing to the rush of the fluid to the lower end. Now, the wonderful thing is that the molecules of all known bodies went one way, while those of iron went the other way. This metal, it would seem, has an origin entirely different from that of the rest of the globe. It is highly improbable that we shall discover some other and cheaper material which will equal or surpass iron in magnetic qualities. <http://www.tfcbooks.com/tesla/1900-06-00.htm>

#nikolatesla #aluminum August 25th 2016 "New method developed for producing some metals" developed 100 years ago by Nikola Tesla's his and work on Aluminum vs Copper vs Iron and his work on "Purifying Metals" (FBI File) <http://phys.org/news/2016-08-method-metals.html> -- "The Problem of Increasing Human Energy, 1915" -- Most of the metal is now produced in the electric furnace by a process combining fusion and electrolysis, which offers a number of advantageous features, but involves naturally a great waste of the electrical energy of the current. My estimates show that the price of aluminum could be considerably reduced by adopting in its manufacture a method similar to that proposed by me for the production of iron. A pound of aluminum requires for fusion only about seventy per cent. of the heat needed for melting a pound of iron, and inasmuch as its weight is only about one third of that of the latter, a volume of aluminum four times that of iron could be obtained from a given amount of heat-energy. But a cold electrolytic process of manufacture is the ideal solution, and on this I have placed my hope... I have also succeeded in operating electric motors without iron by such rapidly vibrating currents, but the results, so far, have been inferior to those obtained with ordinary motors constructed of iron, although theoretically the former should be capable of performing incomparably more work per unit of weight than the latter. But the seemingly insuperable difficulties which are now in the way may be overcome in the end, and then iron will be done away with, and all electric machinery will be manufactured of aluminum, in all probability, at prices ridiculously low. This would be a severe, if not fatal, blow to iron. I should estimate its civilizing potency at fully one hundred times that of iron. <http://www.tfcbooks.com/tesla/1900-06-00.htm> -- MIT Manufacturing and Cost Analysis for Aluminum and Copper Die Cast http://msl.mit.edu/theses/Mechler\_GC-thesis.pdf
