Changing Steps: A reflexive journey in transition

Burl Wesley Randolph Jr*

Abstract

Introduction. Transition is a necessary and important facet of life. The expected transition however can cause health concerns and even create great hardship to individuals, families, and organizations. Changing Steps is a reflexive journey in how to manage an unexpected transition resulting from an unforeseen retirement.

Method. The combination of reflection, reflexivity, and managing oneself best describes a qualitative narrative research method. Reflection and reflexivity are normally not categorized as research methods, but reflexive narrative practice may be the first principle in changing steps. Managing oneself and developing a plan for the second half of one's 50 years work life is the second principle and best designed to progress through planned and unplanned transition.

Results. The results of my journey are unknown until writing is concluded. For this qualitative narrative study although the journey is nearly completed, it is also far from over. Through recognizing the need to change mental models from developed to transitional to transformational, whichever of the six steps provides a course for the traveler is where the journey ends.

Discussion. Though transcending a six step journey, Changing Steps is a two-pronged process of stepping through changing mental models and images of Leadership. Changing Steps is the answer to change mental models in an effort to transition images of Leadership from Military to Corporate to Family, to Support Image of Leadership.

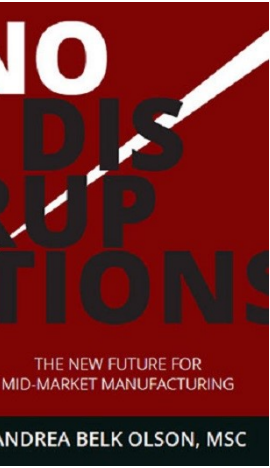

Keywords: Change, leadership, retirement, transition.
