

You can order another round of free at-home COVID tests and here's how to get them:

You can now order another round of free COVID-19 test kits online.

As of December 15, each household in the United States is eligible to receive a new set of four at-home tests in the mail, according to the federal government.

“COVID cases are rising across America as folks gather for the holidays,” President Joe Biden wrote December 15 on Twitter. “That’s why, starting today, every household can order 4 free COVID tests to be shipped straight to your door.” Those interested in the no-cost tests can place their orders at covidtests.gov.

Help also is available on the phone at 800-232-0233.

“Orders for this round of testing will begin to ship starting the week of December 19th and continue in the weeks ahead,” the White House wrote in a news release.

The rapid antigen tests are being delivered through the U.S. Postal Service. People who order them are urged to check their mail, as cold temperatures can lead to inaccurate results, McClatchy News reported. “In order to ensure appropriate test performance with a test that is delivered to you in below freezing temperatures, you should bring the package inside your home and leave it unopened at room temperature for at least two hours before opening it,” officials wrote on the covidtests.gov website.
