TYPES OF MANUFACTURING PROCESSES

Wet Salting: In this process, fresh animal skins or hides are treated with salt to prevent spoilage and preserve them for further processing. Wet salting helps remove excess moisture and inhibits bacterial growth, making it easier for transportation and storage.

Tanning: Tanning is a crucial step in the leather-making process, where the animal skins or hides undergo chemical treatment to convert them into durable, flexible, and long-lasting leather. Tanning involves the use of various tanning agents to stabilize the collagen fibers present in the skin, preventing it from decaying and improving its resistance to water and heat.

Wet-Blue Tanning: This is a specific type of chrome tanning process that produces "wet-blue" leather. In this process, chromium salts are used to tan the hides, resulting in a bluish hue on the leather. Wet-blue leather is ideal for further processing into a variety of finished leather products.

Vegetable Tanning: Unlike chrome tanning, vegetable tanning utilizes tannins from plant sources, such as tree bark, to tan the hides. This process results in a natural, environmentally friendly leather with unique aging properties, often used for premium and luxury products.

Oil Tanning: In oil tanning, the hides are treated with oils and fats to create soft and supple leather. Oil-tanned leather is commonly used for products like gloves and some types of apparel due to its pliability.

Aldehyde Tanning: Aldehyde tanning uses aldehyde-based agents to tan the hides, resulting in soft and light-colored leather suitable for applications like garment linings and suede.

Brain Tanning: An ancient method where animal brains are used as a natural tanning agent. This traditional process is often employed in crafting traditional and artisanal leather products.

TANNING PROCESS

The tanning process involves several stages, which may vary depending on the type of tannery and the desired properties of the leather. Here's an overview of the general tanning process:

Preparation: The animal skins or hides are first cleaned to remove any dirt, hair, or flesh. They may undergo soaking in water to rehydrate the hides if they were dried or salted previously.

Liming: The hides are treated with lime or similar alkaline substances to remove hair, epidermis, and other unwanted proteins from the skin. This step also helps to swell the fibers and prepare them for tanning.

Deliming and Bating: After liming, the hides are "delimed" to neutralize the excess lime and then "bated" using enzymes to further soften and clean the hides.

Tanning Agent Application: The actual tanning process begins, where the tanning agent is applied to the hides. Different types of tanning agents, such as chrome salts or plant-derived tannins, are used depending on the desired characteristics of the leather.

Neutralization: The tanned hides are neutralized to stop the tanning process and ensure the proper pH level for further treatments.

Finishing: After tanning, the leather may undergo various finishing treatments, such as dyeing, re-tanning, fat-liquoring, and drying, to achieve the desired appearance and performance properties.

COMMON GRADES

The specific grading system and terminology may vary depending on the leather industry and region, and DM International can provide their custom grading system to best suit their products.

Grade A: The highest quality grade, featuring minimal blemishes, even color distribution, and uniform texture. Suitable for luxury leather goods and high-end products.

Grade B: Good quality hides with slight imperfections, suitable for a wide range of applications such as upholstery, footwear, and accessories.

Grade C: Hides with more visible imperfections and natural marks, offering a rustic and characterful appearance. Ideal for casual leather products and artisanal items.

Grade D: Hides with noticeable flaws and irregularities, suitable for applications where aesthetics are less critical, such as industrial use or low-cost items.

Full Grain: The highest grade with the entire grain intact, showcasing the natural beauty and character of the animal skin. Ideal for premium leather goods.

Top Grain: A high-quality grade where the outermost layer of the grain is sanded to remove imperfections, resulting in a smooth and consistent surface.

Split Grain: The lower-grade section of the hide, often used for suede or split leather products due to its soft and napped surface.

Corrected Grain: Hides with imperfections that have been corrected through sanding or buffing, then embossed with an artificial grain pattern for a uniform appearance.

Aniline: A premium grade of leather that retains its natural surface and showcases the unique markings of the animal, providing a luxurious and soft feel.

Semi-Aniline: A grade of leather that undergoes slight pigmentation to even out color and add protection while still preserving the natural look and feel.

80/20 GRADING SYSTEM

80% Clear Surface: This refers to the percentage of the hide's surface that is clean, unblemished, and free from imperfections or visible marks. It indicates the portion of the hide that is suitable for higher-quality leather products.

20% Imperfections: This represents the remaining 20% of the hide's surface area that may have visible marks, scars, insect bites, wrinkles, or other natural blemishes. These imperfections do not necessarily affect the structural integrity of the leather, but they may impact the aesthetics of the final product.

IMPLICATIONS IN THE SELECTION PROCESS

The "80/20" grading system is used by tanners and leather manufacturers to classify hides based on their surface quality. Hides with an "80/20" grading are generally considered to be of higher quality compared to hides with a lower grading. Here's how it affects the selection process:

Product Quality: Hides with an "80/20" grading are often preferred for producing premium and high-end leather products. The larger proportion of clear surface area allows for the creation of luxurious and aesthetically pleasing leather goods.

Usage: The grading can help determine the appropriate application for the hides. Hides with a higher "80% clear surface" ratio are typically chosen for applications where aesthetics are of paramount importance, such as luxury upholstery, high-fashion accessories, and high-end leather goods.

Cost: Hides with an "80/20" grading are generally more valuable than hides with a lower grading due to their higher quality and suitability for premium products. As a result, they may command a higher price in the market.

Customization: For clients seeking specific characteristics in their leather products, the "80/20" grading system allows for customization based on the desired level of imperfections and natural marks.

IMPORTANCE OF YIELD

Cost Considerations: Knowing the yield of a hide helps tanners and manufacturers determine the cost-effectiveness of producing leather from that hide. Hides with a higher yield are generally more efficient and economical, as they produce more usable leather per unit.

Material Utilization: Yield is crucial for optimizing material utilization in leather production. Higher-yield hides result in less wastage of material, reducing costs and supporting sustainable practices.

Product Planning: For leather manufacturers and designers, understanding the yield of hides aids in accurate product planning and material sourcing. It ensures they can estimate the amount of leather required for specific projects, reducing the risk of under- or over-ordering.

Customization Possibilities: Depending on the project's requirements, clients may prioritize hides with higher yields to maximize material usage or choose hides with unique characteristics and accept lower yields for more exclusive and customized products.

FACTORS AFFECTING YIELD

The yield of a hide can be influenced by various factors, including:

Hide Size: Larger hides generally have higher yields due to more usable surface area.

Grading and Quality: Higher-grade hides with fewer imperfections often have better yields since they have more clear surface area suitable for high-quality leather.

Tanning Process: Different tanning methods and techniques may impact yield, as certain processes can result in more or less shrinkage or wastage.

Cutting and Trimming: The skill and precision of cutting and trimming during leather processing can affect the final yield.

YIELD ESTIMATION

Tanners typically have an estimation of the average yield for different types of hides they process, which can be shared with customers during the selection process. This information allows customers to make informed decisions based on their specific project needs and budget considerations.

MEASUREMENT

The measurement of animal hides is an essential process in the leather industry to determine the size and dimensions of the hides accurately. Proper measurement ensures that tanners, manufacturers, and customers have a clear understanding of the hide's surface area and assists in estimating yield, planning production, and calculating costs. Here's how hides are typically measured:

Square Footage (sq. ft.): The most common unit of measurement for leather hides is the square foot. A square foot is a unit of area equal to a square with sides of one foot in length. To measure a hide in square feet, the length and width of the hide are measured, and the two values are multiplied together.

Side Lengths: The length and width of the hide are the primary dimensions used for measurement. The length refers to the longest side of the hide, typically measured from the neck to the tail. The width is measured across the widest part of the hide.

Total Surface Area: To calculate the total surface area of a hide, multiply the length by the width. For example, a hide with a length of 6 feet and a width of 4 feet would have a total surface area of 6 feet x 4 feet = 24 square feet.

Trimming Allowance: In some cases, hides may have irregular edges or excess parts that are trimmed off during processing. Tanners may include a trimming allowance to account for this, which is usually a small percentage of the total surface area.

Grading and Yields: The measurement of hides is often connected to grading and yield estimation. As mentioned earlier, the grading system may involve assessing the percentage of clear surface area (e.g., "80/20" grading). Yield estimation is critical for tanners to determine the amount of usable leather obtained from each hide.

Digital Measurement Tools: Modern tanneries may use advanced digital measurement tools, such as laser scanners or computer-aided design (CAD) systems, for precise and efficient hide measurement.

Standard Units: The square footage measurement is typically used universally in the leather industry. However, different regions may also use metric units, such as square meters, for measurement.

Accurate measurement is crucial to ensure transparency and consistency in the leather trade. When purchasing hides, customers can inquire about the measurement methods used by the supplier to ensure they receive the appropriate size and quantity of leather for their specific projects.
