3 (Three) Poems

By Lauren Scharhag

_Poetry editor Hezekiah writes…_ It has always been my confessed contention that ambiverts make the best Tarot card readers. I am also one. Lauren Scharhag has a mouthful surname but her poetry is extraordinary. 'Virtual Cloister' is one such. Here, she is one funny, angry gal, “It’s not even the dick pics that get me.” “dry-humping at shadows.” “a solipsistic affair.” Now, we have that out of the way... “You ought to wear your hair up.” Here is hoping you get the direct message. I ‘...love Lou Diamond Phillips’ as well, and who doesn’t love ‘...a fat girl [?]’ (Spacing and font size are poet’s own.) HS

Virtual Cloister

It’s not even the dick pics that get me.
They’re in the same category as old-timey flashers prowling public spaces in trench coats,
no doubt enjoying the breeze against their balls,
dry-humping at shadows.
Dick-pic senders seem to expect nothing.
It’s all one-sided, a solipsistic affair.

Nor is it the ones who invite me to sext.
At least they’re up-front about it. Mostly.
They might lead off with something like,
_You have a nice smile_,
(My pictures are almost invariably from the neck up
to discourage more explicit compliments)
then quickly segue to the request
for tedious, sticky fumblings
and they’re not even as charming
as Hannibal Lecter innuendos.

No, it’s the ones who slip into my inbox
by striking up conversation.
Young men rush to impress me with their vast knowledge.
(They never ask if I’m already acquainted with the subject.)
In fact, they ask me nothing about myself.)
If we were talking together in person, I guess,
they’d preen and flex their muscles,
like birds of paradise showing off their dance moves.
Older men love to reminisce about their travels,
their wars. They tell me about their dogs.
They pat me on the head (virtually)
and dispense advice like, Appreciate the moment.
Before you know it, it’s gone.
and You ought to wear your hair up.
And I wonder how old they think I am,
or why they think they’re qualified
to tell me I “ought to” anything.
Then come the implied sighs,
the, Oh, how I wish I had someone.
It would be so nice to come home
to a good woman.
I love a good massage—both getting them and giving them.
I don’t know if they’re drunk or if, somehow,
they’ve never heard the sound
of their own voices.

And then, there’s the lone woman who says
she’ll show me her tits if I show her mine.
I think about it. Tat for tat.

Then I add to my profile, No DMs, please.
All the West Side Girls Love Lou Diamond Phillips

Summer of ’88 and La Bamba was released on VHS. Us West Side kids had found our idol.

Before that, we got excited whenever Speedy Gonzalez appeared on our TV screens. There was an old Chevy Chase film my mother loved mostly for the sassy Mexican cook with whom she shared a name, Aurora, and we loved anything with Cheech Marin. If there were other bits of Mexico in pop culture at the time, I’m hard-pressed to think of them. (Desi Arnez was Cuban. Also: black-and-white. No, thank you.) But we held them to our hearts like talismans.

Mexicans were still exotic back then in the way that Italians were exotic in 1905. My friends didn’t know what a tamal was. When they came to dinner, they tried to eat it husk and all. The only Mexican restaurants in town served tacos in store-bought shells, and everything came with a side of refried bean puree, smothered in white cheese that was like a mockery of queso fresco. But suddenly, everyone knew the song, “La Bamba.” They played it everywhere, at the supermarket, at school dances, and even the white girls agreed, Lou Diamond Phillips was so cute.

He wasn’t even Latino, but we loved him anyway.

My tío made bootleg copies for everyone and we watched it over and over. We knew all the songs, every dance move.
We re-enacted them on the front porch,
using a broom as a guitar, a hairbrush
as a microphone. We were amazed that someone could sing in Spanish
and sound cool, none of the warbling ballads
or cheesy corridos heavy on the accordion
that we knew from our abuela’s records.

We girls started wearing our hair
in high, 1950s ponytails, tied with big bows.
Our Catholic school saddle oxfords
were suddenly stylish. The boys either combed their hair into pompadours
or wanted black leather jackets
like Bob. Now, thirty years later,
my cousin still thinks he’s Esai Morales,
roaring around on his motorcycle,
and I can’t hear “Sleep Walk”
without getting choked up.

Stand and Deliver came out
that same year, but a math teacher
isn’t nearly as sexy, and we had to wait
ten years for Selena, for Jennifer Lopez
to come with her nalgas and spangled bras.
(Also not an actual Mexican,
but we’ll take what we can get.)
On loving a fat girl

Skinniness is next to godliness, or so say medieval art of hollow-cheeked saints and all those runway models in angel’s wings and expensive lingerie

Earthly is another word for fat, a back-handed compliment as all words that try to be fat-positive are

Gluttony a sin
Sensual pleasures a sin
Loving this world a sin

We’re supposed to ascend, lighter than air, to the one beyond and the robes are not one-size-fits-all

But what if I want to stay here a while? What if I want to forego the land of milk and honey, preferring instead chocolate and wine?

What if a single God in His single heaven is not large enough to contain us all? What if some of us were meant for pantheons and oh-so forgiving togas? What if your shame-and-guilt God has no place in my big fat world?

Fat girl, you are a magnificent mountain that I want to scale: the higher the peaks, the lusher the valleys. You are a sacred grove the gods have smiled on.

There is a body under this robe, built for more than suffering and motherhood. There is more than one way to love. There is more than one way to love the divine.
THE POET SPEAKS: All three of these poems come from a very personal place. “All the West Side Girls Love Lou Diamond Phillips” was inspired by my actual experiences growing up—my mother is Mexican, my father is German; both are first-generation Americans. I was mainly raised by my mother and her family. In the 80s, there really wasn’t much in the way of Latinx representation on TV or in films. Representation has become a big subject recently—who it affects and why it matters. When the movie, La Bamba, came out, it was such a huge deal to us, and not just because Ritchie Valens was a famous musician. It was because it showed the day-to-day life of a Mexican family—rolling tortillas, picking fruit, a brother just out of prison. I wanted to share this experience, so people can see how meaningful it is to see people who look like you on screen, especially for kids. Every word of that poem is absolutely true.

“Virtual Cloister” came from a place of sheer frustration. Any woman with any sort of Internet presence will tell you that we get creeped on by random guys on the regular—there’s a reason the phrase “sliding into DMs” exists. So that’s not really new, but I’ve had several particularly bad experiences lately with men who strike up a conversation and act friendly at first. Then they get skeevy, or demanding, or both, and that can only too easily become abusive. It’s so bad, I’ve actually disabled the inbox on my author page on Facebook and muted all DMs on Twitter and Instagram. I don’t know if it’s quarantine, like everyone’s a bit crazy from too much isolation or what, but seriously, I’ve had six guys in the past month or so who started out nice, then got very hostile when they felt I wasn’t paying enough attention to them. I’m like, who are you people? We don’t really know each other. Even if I did, why do you think anyone owes you their attention? And would you treat another man this way? I think not. I tried to season the piece with a bit of humor, which, in retrospect, just shows how a woman in this society is conditioned to downplay criticism of men, even in our art.

“On loving a fat girl” sprung from a conversation I had with a fellow Latina about weight and white beauty standards. All my adult life, I have struggled with my weight due to chronic health problems and medication. I was on a medication recently that caused me to put on 16 pounds in three months that I really couldn’t afford. (Who can?) And, yes, I do eat right and work out—in fact, since quarantine, I’ve really stepped it up, incorporating body weight training into my routine. But the weight just doesn’t come off. It’s all very frustrating. The funny thing is, as a bisexual woman, I have often been attracted to plus-sized women, so I don’t know why I hold myself to this standard that I don’t particularly find attractive in others. My friend helped me see that you have to find and claim your own beauty—self-worth is not something someone can give to you, not even those that you love. She also helped me to see that worrying about what I look like clutters the mind, takes up valuable intellectual and emotional real estate that could be put to more productive uses. Also, there’s no prize for being thin. My fat body can do all the things that my skinny body could do. Fat isn’t inherently ugly, and it doesn’t have to be a limitation. It was truly a life-altering conversation for me. This poem is what I hope to be the first of many exploring that.

Overall, I don’t know that I have a consistent style, though these poems are reflective of what I think of as my conversational poems. They are purely my voice, conveyed as if I were speaking directly to you. (I have other styles that imitate other, better poets.) I am also a fiction writer, so I am also very comfortable working with narrative. My odd, biracial heritage was a huge influence on me, growing up in a bilingual family. My mother’s family was quite poor, and my father’s family was wealthy, so that also had a profound influence on my worldview. My German grandfather didn’t speak English when he came to this country, but he gave up his native tongue. He did not identify as German, or as an immigrant. I didn’t even know he spoke German until after he died—but he was a successful business owner. My Mexican family never gave up their Spanish and did not achieve that sort of prosperity. I think this shows a lot about how this country insists on assimilation. As a result, code switching came to me as naturally as breathing. I am a linguistic chameleon, changing the diction to fit the message. So I read and write poetry because language is everything—what language to use and when to use it for the maximum desired effect. To quote Joseph Brodsky, “For a writer, only one form of patriotism exists: his attitude towards language.”
