FEATURED NOVEL

AUTHOR BIOGRAPHY

Susan Hailey writes atmospheric suspense in which the places people inhabit hold secrets of their own. From the California coast, she draws on a lifelong fascination with historic architecture, complicated relationships, and the uneasy distance between appearance and truth.

Raised in Arlington Heights, Illinois, Hailey studied economics at Loyola University Chicago. Before turning her attention to fiction, she built a career across entrepreneurship, event production, management, and design. Those experiences continue to inform the visual detail and carefully layered worlds of her novels.

After living in Chicago, Indianapolis, and Dallas, she settled in San Diego. Her novel Ravina combines psychological mystery with gothic unease; her next novel, Mr. Impossible, is forthcoming.

Hailey approaches fiction with a visual storyteller's eye, building tension through setting, character, and the details that initially seem insignificant. Her work returns to the questions of what people conceal, how power operates within relationships, and what happens when a familiar place becomes threatening. Outside her writing, she draws inspiration from music, art, historic buildings, and the changing light along the Southern California coast.

RAVINA

At a coastal college outside Boston, a young woman finds that the world around her is not quite what it seems. Behind familiar corridors and carefully maintained appearances lie concealed spaces, unsettling questions, and people whose motives are difficult to read. As the boundaries between trust and control begin to blur, she must decide which truths to confront—and what discovering them might cost. Ravina is a psychological suspense novel with gothic and supernatural undertones.
