Statement by USIPA Executive Director, Seth Ginther on Davos 2019

RICHMOND, VA – “This week world leaders are meeting in Davos to take on the world’s most pressing issues— chief of which remains climate change and how to mitigate its effects. Since last year’s Davos meetings, the United Nations, along with countless other nations and organizations, have issued dire reports calling for solutions to cut carbon emissions before the worst effects of climate change materialize around the world. Biomass remains a viable solution that nearly all of the reports and experts say will go far to curb emissions. Europe and Asia are working closely with industry to meet ambitious energy commitments and the U.S. must follow suit. Because the fact is: bioenergy is a vital source of renewable energy that, along with others, will help reduce the effects of climate change.”
