Please consider the museum when deciding how to dispose of a boat or vehicle that you no longer need. We can pick up the vessel or car and provide the necessary paperwork for tax purposes. Your contributions greatly help the local community and our beloved museum. ## STORIES FROM A FISHING VILLAGE

IT'S IN HIS BLOOD BY: CAROL MURATORE

Raised in Foxwell's, Clint Wade Steel has fishing in his blood. He's a third-generation waterman and it could even go farther back for all he knows. His dad and granddad fished before him. Clint has been a full-time waterman from his childhood all through his adult life.

Of his earliest childhood memories, he recalls being "put into a life jacket while mom and daddy worked at their fish house to process the fish they caught". The life jacket was on him to keep him afloat just in case he fell into the water. They even put him in a bouncy chair wearing it while they did the hard work of getting the fish ready for market.

As Clint grew up, he worked with his dad on the water. They were catching Spot Croakers and using Gil Nets back then. Although he would have liked to work on the water full time, his parents were adamant that Clint finish high school. So, he worked during summers and when he could during the school year. As soon as he could, he got out on the water and did almost every type of fishing available on the local waterways of the Chesapeake Bay Area.

Clint caught bait to catch crabs. He crabbed, oystered and fished for tuna, longline sharks along with horn dogs which are a type of shark. Clint mostly worked for other watermen or ran operations for them. It's not easy to just go out and start up a fishing operation. In addition to the "know how" and financial capital, you also need a license which is costly and hard-to-get as they are very limited. Often, licenses are inherited. He believes if a young person puts in the time, works under someone; it should be easier for them to get their license and not wait for someone to die to inherit one.

On a typical day, Clint rises at 3:00am to ready himself for the day. By 4:00am he's checked the weather and dressed accordingly before downing a soda. Then a cigarette and BC powder give him the jumpstart he needs to get out on the water. The boats get back in by late morning. It's not something an average American worker has to do. It's hard work but it does have an allure. What Clint loves about his work is the feeling of freedom. "It's hard to explain...it's bred into you. It's in your blood. It's a calling"

I pressed him with questions like "isn't it dangerous work?" And he just laughed and said "of course it is. We joke about that all the time." And it struck me. This truly is the Wild, Wild West and these folks are in a sort of rodeo every day. Except at a rodeo when the cowboy is thrown, he hits the ground. If these guys get tossed off a boat, it's the deep sea. When these small fishing boats return full of fish, the water is lapping over the sides. It's not for the faint of heart. You've got to keep your sense of humor.

When asked what he disliked about his work, Clint just shrugged it off. Work is work. No matter what you have to do, there's going to be stuff that annoys you. "If you had to go into a field every day and bend over to pick up $100 bills, you would still complain that your back was killing you. So, there's always something, but in general I like being on the water."

When his dad passed away a couple of years ago, Clint inherited his dad's crab license. Clint intends to start up a crabbing business. He said he would rather have his dad than the license but realizes how lucky he is to have it. When asked if he wants his boys, his two sons to follow in his footsteps, his answer is quick. He says he would be proud of whatever they decide to do. However, he would like it if one of them kept the family tradition alive. Clint thinks it's important for the industry to have more young people enter the field. It's important to keep jobs here in this country and food on our tables.

I asked Clint if he thought the menhaden were being overfished in our waters. Clint's answer was thoughtful and measured. He told me that Delaware closed waters to menhaden fishing. Interestingly, the menhaden population shrunk. In his experience, he believes menhaden are fish that need to be cultivated. Think of it as a garden left untended. It overgrows and dies.

I asked him if he thought there was a problem with rockfish not having enough menhaden for their food. Again, he was thoughtful and measured. Clint explained to me that both rockfish and bluefish live in these waters. They both fight for the same fish for food. Rockfish and Bluefish can't coexist. Sooner or later, you get tired of being slapped and move on to different feeding grounds. Maybe the rockfish just got tired of getting slapped and moved on.

Clint gave me a lot to think about. He's out there every day. He knows these waters and the fish. They are important to him and his livelihood. We can't possibly know as much about the fish as the watermen do. Every conversation that affects them or any legislation regarding these waters, must include watermen. Why? Because they know. It's in their blood.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT:

Please help us welcome Teresa Coyne, our new office manager!

FISHERMEN'S FUN FACT:

Marathon Man, Jeff Kolodzinski, holds the world record for most fish caught in 24 hours. In 2022, he caught a whopping 3,774 fish in a 24 hour stretch. All fishing was done from the shore, and he used inexpensive, beginner level tackle.

Kilodzinski sets new records to raise money for the Fishing For Life NextGEN program, serving kids, families, veterans, and communities through fishing and outdoor programs!
