Peace, justice,

research & action

CRRIC is composed of a group of scholars, experts and development practitioners committed to make a difference in applied social studies through knowledge translation in peace and justice research and humanitarian action inside and outside Canada. CRRIC views social well-being as a manifestation of people's access to social enterprise and social justice. A pool of social scientists and development activists joined in hand to engage their talents towards time-sensitive peacebuilding policy dialogues, as well as develop programs and intervention projects to extend safety-nets for the communities vulnerable to conflicts and resilience challenges.

One of the objectives of CRRIC is to conduct need-specific research, training, and advocacy activism to benefit client institutions and social groups. Being a non-profit organization, the other objective of CRRIC is to reutilize its service-driven revenue into efforts leading to livelihood development of the disadvantaged people inside and outside Canada. CRRIC's livelihood development priority goes for women and children—homeless street children; political, ethnic and environmental refugees; child workers in sex trade and hazardous workplace settings; immigrants and refugees, stateless and displaced people, and other marginalized social groups including the indigenous communities globally.

CRRIC views research and action as two sides of a coin. Its voluntary action research initiatives and consequent dialogues are intended to dig deep into outcome-oriented practical actions against conflicts, and barriers to resilience, peace and social justice. CRRIC adopts a social epidemiology approach asserting that stigma, prejudice and social exclusions (against HIV/AIDS, sexually marginalized groups etc.) cause social diseases (i.e., dowry-terror, addiction and substance abuse, child marriage, child abuse, honor killing, female infanticide, feticide, trafficking etc.) contributing to erosions of peace and social justice in society. CRRIC, with 'knowledge translation' approach, commits to work together with research and grassroots development partners to extend expert technical supports in project appraisal, program and project development, feasibility study, impact assessment, strategic planning, monitoring, evaluation and report writing.

RESEARCH,

ADVOCACY,
TRANSCRIPTION
& DISSEMINATION SERVICES

CRRIC specializes in qualitative study, in-depth and participatory probing, and triangulation research. It also carries out trainings and capacity building workshops aligning modules and topics with changing societal contexts.

CRRIC offers services through research partnership unit (RPU). The objective of this unit is to build mutually beneficial research, training, advocacy and transcription service partnership with universities, research institutions, GO-NGOs and individual researchers. While playing partnership roles in research projects of universities and GO-

NGOs, CRRIC does not ignore persistent individual-level need for crucial research and language supports. CRRIC extends logistic and technical support to individual researchers or graduate students of overseas universities conducting field study for their social science projects in Canada.
