

The American Association of Psychotherapists (AAP) was formed to provide credentialing, standards of practice, professional identity, and self-regulation for behavioral health consultants.

The purpose of the American Association of Psychotherapists (AAP) is to establish a cohesive national organization that credentials ethical, highly educated and well-trained consultants. The AAP provides members with opportunities to connect with one another. The common goal of AAP is to maintain a level of collaboration which is of great value to individuals and society.

The AAP is concerned with establishing guidelines, promoting education and training, confirming the professional identity of the members, educating the public about the benefits of behavioral health interventions, providing networking and resource development.

The AAP is a professional and educational organization that is dedicated to the growth and enhancement of the behavioral health profession.

The AAP represents various disciplines including researchers, educators, lawyers, clinicians, consultants and care partners as its members.
