I miss September 12th

I hate that September 11th happened, I hate that so many people died, that families were forever torn apart, sadness, pain, heartbreak, and fear was felt around the world. Innocence was lost that day.

To this very day, 24 years later, it is still so very real and painful to think about ... and we all should still ...

As the years pass, we become a little complacent ... for all those whose lives were extinguished and the families that have had to carry on, to all the heroes that passed and those that carry on earning every feather of their wings still ... we must never forget.

(a trip to the 9/11 Museum is a profound reminder ...it encapsulates the day, it reminds us all how real it still is)

If any one of us could change it, we would. If we could wish with all our might to turn back time and never know that devastation, it would never have happened.

But sadly, no one has the power, faith, or ability to change it, and here we are, forever scarred. Our world changed that day.

Now here we are, 2025, in a world, I for one don't recognize. So very many people are struggling, people hating people that hate people for hating people, people losing trust in almost everyone, sometimes even those close.

When I think back on that day, 24 years ago, the next day, September 12th, and the days, months and years that followed, we all banded together. People were kind, compassionate, caring and willing to help each other, no matter who they were, no matter their colour, race, religion, gender, beliefs, none of that mattered, we were all fellow humans, looking out for each other. Every one wanted and felt compelled to help, in anyway they could.

Personally, I saw it in a ribbon campaign, 2 friends and I dedicated months to. Putting everything else aside to focus on raising funds we could send over to help, even in a small way, we just had to do something.

We met so many people, all feeling the same, people reached out to us to give whatever they could, they too just wanted to be apart of the positive. They shared stories, their feelings and their love with us, strangers to one another.

The world became a place of love and compassion, people cared about each other, they would talk to a stranger, we all became a little closer, united by a tragedy that was not selective in who the victims were or the broad circle that every single one of the 2,977 lives lost engulfed.

We all seemed to try to make the world just a lil better with a smile, a hug, a hand, however we could show that we were all one, united.

Where did we go wrong? We are no where close to that anymore. How in the world can we get back there?

I beg, could we all just remember, can we put aside all the hate, can we not have to go through anything even half as tragic to get back there.

Please we don't need another 9/11, we just have to remember, we just have to reach down in our hearts and bring out our love, acceptance and our compassion and spread it everywhere. If we started close and each one of us reached out to just 2 new people, just think of the possibilities, just imagine how things could be.

We CAN wish this to fruition, we DO have the power, faith and ability to change.

I miss September 12th...

Maybe, just maybe, we could start here in our little Community ... wouldn't that be awesome!
