LAKE ELSINORE

For centuries the Pai-ah-che Indians lived in the valley around the lake, which they named Etengvo Wumoma (Hot Springs by the Little Sea). The Spaniards came and called the lake Laguna Grande. The first American surveyors called it Laguna Temecula.

In the year 1880, Franklin H. Heald climbed the summit of Mount Baldy, and was intrigued by a shining body of water nestled in the seemingly endless range of mountains. He was told he had seen a mirage, but he was persistent. In 1881, he drove his buggy up through Temescal Canyon and came in sight of the Big Lagoon, as it was known locally. In 1882, with his new financial partners, Donald Graham and William Collier, Heald purchased 12,812 acres.

Heald had visions of a new colony by the hidden lake, tracks were completed on the California Southern line from National City to Colton, and in 1885 it would connect with the Santa Fe tracks to the east. His new colony had a railroad!

The promoters didn't like the name Laguna Grande for the new town and so the name Elsinore was chosen. Margaret Collier Graham, wife of one of the town's founders named it from the immortality given it by Shakespeare in Hamlet. Town lots were selling for $45 and upward. Farm land was going for $25 per acre.

The late 1920s and 30s were a boom for Elsinore with its bath houses and hot springs. Many famous names from the movie colony (Hollywood) built homes around the lake, but probably the most famous was the noted evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson. In July 1928, she built her home on the hill overlooking the lake. This house won fame as "Aimee's Castle." Aimee's Castle served as the evangelist's part-time home until 1939, when it passed to new ownership and still stands as a private home today.
