A BRIEF HISTORY OF TEMESCAL VALLEY

A San Luis Rey Mission priest in 1818 sent a soldier north to an area largely populated by Native Americans and grizzly bears. Leandro Serrano was told to befriend the native tribesmen, who favored the area’s natural hot springs, and to eliminate the bears. He was given a “paper” — a permit or license to graze cattle on about four to five leagues of land — roughly 27 to 34 square miles.

Serrano found the area abundant with flowing water and lush vegetation. He called the area Rancho Temescal and built an adobe in about 1824. That adobe was the first home built by a non-Native American in what would later become Riverside County.

Through the years, Serrano raised livestock, planted orchards and vineyards, married twice and fathered 13 children. As the family grew, Serrano built other adobes, as did his sons and sons-in-law.

Land barons and squatters arrived decades later, challenging Serrano’s claim. The U.S. Supreme Court in 1866, 14 years after Serrano’s death in 1852, denied the family’s ownership. The family was given 160 acres surrounding the current adobe in which they lived. The court decision allowed others to claim mineral and water rights. The water was piped to neighboring areas, eventually leaving Temescal Valley dry and desolate.

Serrano’s second wife died penniless in the 1890s. The last of the Serrano family — two daughters — had to mortgage the family home to pay her burial costs, and the two left the valley in 1898 to live in Los Angeles.

Through the years, very little of the Serrano legacy has been preserved. What still exists are two tanning vats that Serrano used to process leather. They are situated east of the 1-15 at the Temescal Canyon Road interchange, across the street from the Shell Station. This isn’t the original location of the vats, which were moved and reconstructed at this site years ago.
