

9 Insane Hellcat Swapped Cars

MAR 8, 2020 / BY IAN WRIGHT N CAR CULTURE

10 COMMENTS

If you want to go hellaciously fast, you need a Hellcat engine.

Dodge's Hellcat engine made its first splash by giving the Challenger an immense 707 horsepower to shred rubber with. Inevitably, some Dodge Challenger Hellcat cars were crashed, and the engines were bought and transferred into other cars. Now, the Hellcat engine is available as a crate engine so anyone with the money can buy a brand new 6.2-liter Supercharged V8 engine and put it in anything they damn well please. If you're thinking of going down that route rather than picking one up from a breaker's yard, it costs around $16,000 and is designed to work with Tremec T56 Magnum transmissions, although there is a controller available to match it to other gearboxes.

That's a huge engine and a lot of transmission to fit into a car that wasn't designed with a supercharged V8 in mind. That means it takes a creative mind, a lot of technical skill, and, in some cases, a complete lack of fear to drive the resulting car. These are the most hellacious of Hellcat swapped cars we have seen over the past couple of years.

Hellcat-Swapped 1968 Coronet Cop Car

When House Of Mouse Racing decided to Hellcat swap a 1968 Coronet cop car, it was a last-minute decision as the engine was due to go into a 1970 Baracuda. The 'Cuda would have taken too long to build, though, and the Hot Rod Power Tour 2019 was just months away. So, House Of Mouse threw the engine and the front suspension into the Coronet shell it already had available. The tuners then printed up special Hot Rod tickets for the event to "cite" people to raise money for Shop with a Cop, so not only is it an awesome off the cuff project, but it was put to great use as well.

