

Science - an essay - Ray Melnik

I hate you, but thank you that I am still alive well past my 40th birthday.

I hate you, but thank you for the plane I will fly in to London later this month.

I hate you, but thank you for the stove to cook my food and refrigerator that keeps it fresh.

I hate you, but thank you for the car I use to drive many miles to see friends and family.

I hate you, but thank you for the air conditioning on the hot days and heating on the cold ones.

I hate you, but thank you for flushing toilets and the hot shower in my home.

I hate you, but thank you for the glasses I need to read this page.

I hate you, but thank you for all the life enhancing discoveries.

I hate you, but thank you for a new view of the universe that continues to unlock worlds.

I hate you, but thank you for putting the knowledge of this world in the palm of my hand.

I hate you, but thank you that I can make a call from and to anywhere on earth.

I hate you, but thank you for all the lives you save and make better.

You burst my bubble of myth and I hate you for it, but I will use you for whatever I choose whenever I choose, and it makes me feel powerful.