Reading Comprehension (Questions 11-15)

Passage

In the heart of the Amazon rainforest, there lies a species of tree known as the "Lung of the World." This tree has the unique ability to produce 20% more oxygen than the average tree in the rainforest. Scientists have studied its properties for decades, marveling at its resilience and its pivotal role in the global ecosystem. Despite its importance, the "Lung of the World" is under threat due to deforestation and climate change, leading to significant concern among environmentalists. They argue that protecting this tree is not just about preserving a single species but is crucial for maintaining global air quality and biodiversity.
