From the Navigator

After letting go her lines yesterday afternoon, Queen Elizabeth set westerly courses to pass through Burrard Inlet, a relatively shallow-sided fjord formed during the last Ice Age. Burrard Inlet opens west into the Strait of Georgia between Point Atkinson and Point Grey. After passing Burrard Inlet, Queen Elizabeth continued her voyage sailing through the Strait of Georgia, and afterwards through Johnstone Strait, a 110 kilometre channel along the north east coast of Vancouver Island in British Columbia. The strait channel between 2.5 kilometres (1.6 miles) and 5 kilometres (3.1 miles) wide. It is a major navigational channel on the west coast of North America. It is the preferred channel for vessels from the Strait of Georgia leaving to the north of Vancouver Island for vessels from the Strait of Georgia leaving to the north of Vancouver Island, through the Queen Charlotte Strait bound for Prince Rupert, Haida Gwaii, Alaska, and the North Pacific Ocean, and for southbound vessels from those areas bound for the ports of Vancouver, Seattle and Tacoma.
