How to use this textbook

Within this textbook, there are many idioms related to animals.

Users of this textbook should identify the different idioms and practice using them. There might be more than one idiom on each page, not just the featured idiom. English language learners should read the story, then draw their own picture, and finally write their own passages using the idioms.

English language learners should have fun with the idioms. They should try to draw fun and interesting pictures, write exciting passages that make them laugh or smile, or perhaps even draw emotional scenes and write passages that make them feel emotional.

Good quality artwork is not that important. The author freely admits that his pictures are childlike and somewhat crude. He deliberately chose to use crayons and a thick black marker pen to create the majority of the illustrations to conceal his lack of artistic talent.

Students can use the character of Hugh Giraffe in their pictures and stories if they wish, or they can draw any picture they like. At the end of the book, there are ten blank pages for students to draw pictures and write their own unique stories using the idioms from the book or any other idioms that they would like to practice.
