

Mademoiselle Fifi

Logline: WWI German officers occupy a house on the border of France, things get going as the officers send out for some entertaining ladies from a near by French town.

Genre: Off beat comedy with Coen brother vibes. (Short)

Currently: Fully developed screenplay awaiting green light to enter pre-production.

Treatment: WWI German officers are hold up in a French village near the Belgium border. The officers are a little stir crazy and rowdy which is evident by the way they have destroyed the former villa of a French family which they took after the Germans occupied the area. The officers and their commander Major Graf Von Farlsberg decide that it would be a great idea to send out for some ladies of the night. The film focuses on Baron Von Eyrick who has been called Mademoiselle Fifi since the Germans have arrived in France. He is called this because of his tiny waist and small features, but make no mistake he is no effeminate inside! The film takes of as the ladies arrive for an evening of fine dining, dancing and pleasant conversation. Unfortunately Mademoiselle Fifi gets a little carried away with his lady Rachel, who is the widow of a Frenchman killed in the recent battles. Murder ensues and the tale takes a weird twist. The story is by Guy de Maupassant a very popular French writer of last century. The screenplay adaptation brings the tale to life for the big screen.
