

sculpture has generated more buzz than one he made of his mother. It's so lifelike, some gallery goers have mistaken it for a real person.

Larry says the sculpture is a tribute to his aging mom and creating it actually helped him cope with what many others have to come to grips with -- transforming your life to take care of an aging parent.

"Art fulfills me in many ways," Larry said. "It is very therapeutic and art has helped to take me through this process of caring for my mom and taking me through stressful situations."

One stressful situation for his mom is osteoarthritis and Larry is using his artwork to draw attention to that and the need for a cure.

"It's affected her in a way that often times she was very outgoing and mobile now it's kind of restricted her in terms of her mobility and her desire to be creative as she used to be is no longer there."

He highlights that pain by showing a bone exposed on his mother's knee.
