Background Information About William and Pauline Scott

The Washington State Historical Society (WSHS) received funding allocated from the state legislature in 2020 to research, explore, share and celebrate the history of Black Washingtonians; to recognize and connect Black history across Washington in communities both large and small; to lift up voices; and to lay the groundwork for a permanent display at the state capital acknowledging Black Washingtonians contribution.

William and Pauline Scott, the first Black pioneers to live in Kent, are part of this American story. William was born in August 1819 in North Carolina and his wife Pauline was born in October 1840 in Alabama. The Scotts moved to Kent after losing their barbershop business during the Great Seattle Fire of 1889. While living in Kent, they remained successful business owners, owning over 160 acres, and from their property sold timber, leased roads that crossed their land to timber companies, and operated a “truck farm” which sold commission houses in Seattle.

The Scotts final resting place is the Saar Pioneer Cemetery with a visible marker in Kent, Washington.
