One is comfortable in one's ignorance: That each person is a unique individual. Thereby being an individual in that everyone is unique, and being unique in that everyone is an individual, -each perspective is based off of multiple perspectives: "common knowledge" is all interconnected in as that to change one view or opinion, the individual must change some or all other views or opinions based on this false knowledge. It is predilection, and multiple perspectives cannot be mutually exclusive. Thus to expand predilections, one must grapple with the idea that one is mediocre, yet all persons are unique and differ to some degree in every sentient aspect of being.
