SILICA RAMING MASS

Silica (SiO2), employed as a lining material in induction furnaces, exhibits an acidic nature. Utilized in granular form, it undergoes production via the crushing and grading of premium-grade quartz and quartzite with high purity levels. Its formulation is meticulously controlled, ensuring a specific composition and well-balanced particle size distribution. This meticulous control guarantees optimal compaction and uniformity during installation. This refractory mass boasts remarkable attributes including outstanding thermal stability, robust mechanical strength, and impressive resistance against thermal shocks and slag-related corrosion.
