Educational Director's Report

In French, it's Mardi Gras. In Brazil, it's Carnival. In English, it's Fat Tuesday or Shrove Tuesday. In the Czech Republic, it's Masopust. But wherever you are, the days leading up to the beginning of Lenten season on Ash Wednesday are filled with costumes, parades, singing, dancing, eating and drinking. Masopust translates to 'meat fast' in Old Czech and is the celebration of spring, burial of winter, and feasting as the last chance to eat and drink in excess before Lenten fasting begins on Ash Wednesday.

A common feature of Masopust, Mardi Gras and Carnival are parades and the wearing of masks. Popular masks are devils, death, clowns, and practically any animal under the sun. This year, Ash Wednesday falls on March 5, so the evening of March 4 is the culmination of festivities. The main Masopust celebration begins on Sunday with dinner, followed by dancing and entertainment. In Prague and many towns, bright and early on Monday morning, masqueraders and musicians meet in the village square and then parade around the village, complete with noisemakers, of course. Tuesday, the day before Ash Wednesday, is called masopustní úterý (masopust Tuesday). On that day, parades continue around the town, ending with a festive dance at an inn. The women of the village may have baked a large decorated pastry wreath which will be shared.

Masopust celebrations were discouraged or forbidden under Czechoslovakia's communist regime, but the holiday has become popular again since the 1990s and some towns / cities masopust have been listed by UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization).
