OLUWOLE OMOFEMI

OLUWOLE OMOFEMI

VISUAL ARTIST

Much like the post World War II abstract expressionist artists, such as Mark Rothko, Jackson Pollock and Barnett Newman, Nigerian artist, Oluwole Omofemi's rise to contemporary art stardom is rooted in the turbulent and revolutionary socio-political environment of the past, as well as in the times he now lives, and works in. When speaking to the peers of Omofemi, artists from his native Nigeria, whom he has grown up with, or those he now mentors, all speak with a great deal of pride, and adulation for him, describing him as a torch bearer and a vessel of hope for them.

Born in 1988 in the poorer inner city streets of Ibadan, Nigeria, Omofemi's humble beginnings and steep ascent to the pinnacle of the contemporary African art scene is nothing short of inspirational. His colossal talent was early identified by his neighbours and community, marking him out as a promising artist from his childhood. Omofemi used the proceeds he would gain from hawking beer, as part of the every day grind of living in Ibadan, to buy sketch books and art materials to facilitate and incubate his budding passion. However, it wasn't the hustle and bustle of life in the vibrant Ibadan metropolis nor the early signs of his natural gift for creativity and art that informed what would later make Omofemi one of the most serious and influential artists of his generation. That singular honour is due to his grandfather, who influenced him greatly, and whom Omofemi was deeply fond of.

His grandfather's wisdom and guidance impressed upon the young artist the importance of the preservation of culture, heritage and ancient customs, and instilled in him a lasting appreciation for self belief, pride, and determination, which today he captures and translates on canvas, through his masterful and endearing portraits. Indeed, Omofemi's work has always elevated his subjects to prominence, most of whom are either friends and relatives of his, or strangers he encounters. This sense of national pride, self esteem, authenticity, and heritage, are all keys, recurring motifs that weave together the entirety of his oeuvre, manifested in his striking portraits of independent black women, crowned either with halo-esque afros, distinctive cornrow braids, or strikingly and completely bald, "sakora" hairstyles, indigenous to, and ubiquitous amongst his fellow compatriots, and dating back millennia.
