NASA's use of the term "Serpent" or "serpentine" can refer to several different projects, missions, and even astronomical phenomena.

It can refer to: a robotic snake-like robot being developed for space exploration; a star-forming cloud; a dust devil on Mars; or even an Egyptian deity and a symbol in ancient cosmology.

Here's a breakdown of the different contexts:

1. Robotic Serpent:

- NASA has been developing a snake-like robot, sometimes referred to as a "snakebot," for exploring other planets and performing tasks in space.
- These robots are designed to navigate difficult terrain, such as loose soil and rocky surfaces, where traditional rovers might struggle.
- One example is the Exobiology Extant Life Surveyor \(EELS\), which is being developed for exploring Enceladus.

2. Serpent Star-Forming Cloud:

- Astronomers have identified a star-forming cloud called the "Serpent" or "Serpens" cloud.
- This cloud is a region where new stars are being born.

3. Serpent Dust Devil:

- A dust devil on Mars, photographed by NASA, was nicknamed "Serpent" due to its shape.

4. APEP Mission:

- NASA's APEP (Atmospheric Perturbations around the Eclipse Path) mission, which will involve firing rockets at a solar eclipse, is named after the Egyptian serpent deity Apep.
- Apep is a serpent who is the nemesis of the sun god Ra in ancient Egyptian mythology.

5. Other Contexts:

- The term "Serpent" or "serpentine" also used in relation to the constellation Serpens.
- There are also accounts from astronauts of seeing objects that resemble snakes in space, though these are not officially part of any NASA mission.
