A View from the Sky

Colas Decloitre is a French & British photographer based in the United States, working exclusively from the air. His work explores the point where landscape begins to resemble abstraction, using altitude to reveal patterns, textures, contrasts and colours that are often invisible from the ground.

Since taking up drone photography, he has travelled across deserts, salt flats, volcanic landscapes, coastlines, forests and cities, searching for the moments when landscape becomes pattern, and pattern becomes light. From the remote Andes to the shores of Indonesia, the islands of the North Atlantic and the urban landscapes of the United States and Europe, each place offers a different way of seeing the world from above.

Seen from the sky, familiar landscapes take on a different scale and character. Water becomes fields of colour, mountains become flowing textures, shadows stretch across the earth, and the smallest traces of human presence become delicate marks within vast surroundings. Through these images, altitude is not simply a way of reaching a higher viewpoint, but a means of discovering another way to see the landscape.

These images are available to license; for private collections, publications, and commercial projects alike.
